BEL-AMI

GUY DE MAUPASSANT

BEL-AMI

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRESCH BY JEATH HENRI CHEVALIER

COPYRIGHT MCMXLV BY SUSIL GUPTA

FIRST EDITION
NOVEMBER 1945

0122.31.50.11

PUBLISHED BY SUSIL GUPTA

1, WELLESLEY STREET, CALCUTTA

PRINTED BY J. N. BOSE AT THE INDIAN PRESS LTD.

93A, DHARAMTOLIA STREET, CALCUTTA.

To S. K. S.

CHAPTER I

VEIEN the cashier had handed him the change for his hundredent piece Georges Duroy strolled out of the restaurant.

By nature and pose the typical ex-Sergeant Major, he wang his cane, twisted his moustache with characteristic allitary swagger and cast a quick comprehensive glance on the ngering diners, the glance of an adventurer sprading himself at like a net.

The women had turned towards him, three little working omen, a middle aged music teacher, slovenly, untidy with an avariably dusty hat and perpetually ill fitting dress, and two ourgeoises with their husbands, regular customers of this chopouse with its fixed charges.

Actually on the move he halted a moment and asked himself hat he was to do next. Here he was on the 28th June and in is pocket precisely three franes and forty centimes to finish ie month with. That represented two dinners without lunches r two lunches without dinners at his option. He reflected nat the lunches being twenty-two sous instead of thirty which he dinners would cost him, by contenting himself with the unches he would have a surplus of one franc fifty centimes chich would cover two snacks of bread and sausage plus two pocks upon the boulevard. That was his happy hunting ground, his nightly pleasure haunt; so he started off down to a rue Notre Dame-de-Lorette. He walked or rather marched as he did when he wore his Hussars uniform, chest out, legs a little apart as if just dismounted, striding along the crowded street brutally, jostling shoulders, thrusting aside everyone in his way. He wore his rather shabby top hat at a jaunty angle and tapped the pavement smartly with his heels. the impression of continuously defying someone—the passersby, the houses, the whole city by this indefinable air of the soldier come down to the mere civilian. dressed at a total outlay of sixty franes he possessed a certain rakish distinction, a little on the vulgar side but real enough none the less. Tall, well made, blond reddish chestnut hair, trim, turned up moustache which seemed to effervesce on l lip, blue eyes, naturally curly hair parted down the midd he might well be taken for the villain of popular fiction. was one of those summer evenings when there is not a breat of air in Paris. The city, hot as an oven, seemed to perspit in the suffocating night. The sewers exuded through the granite mouths tainted breath, and the underground kitched threw on to the street from their open windows noxing vapours of dish water and stale food. The conciency in shirt sleeves smoked their pipes outside and pedestriate struggled along with depressed steps, bareheaded, hat in ham

When Georges Duroy reached the boulevard he stopped while undecided what to do next. His idea had been to reach the Champs Elysées and the Bois de Boulogne Avenue to obtain a little fresh air under the trees; but the desire for amoro adventure also worried him. How would the chance com along? He did not know, but he had awaited it every day an every evening for three months. Occasionally, thanks to h personable appearance and smart turn-out, he happened, he and there, on a little affair, but he was all the time on the low out for the real thing, something bigger and better. Pocke empty and blood boiling, he was inflamed by the touch of the pretty lady prowlers of the night who murmured at the street corners; "See me home, darling," but, unable to pay he did m dare to follow them; and waited another affair with other less mercenary kisses. All the same, he loved the places when the women of the town swarmed, their balls, their cafés, their particular streets; he loved to elbow them, to speak to them to be on familiar terms with them, to smell their overpowering scents, to feel himself bodily near them. They were women anyway, women of love. He did not despise them at all with the innate contempt of the aristocrat. He turned towards h Madeleine and followed the stream of the crowd which trickled along depressed by the heat. The great cafes full of the world overflowing to the exits, parading their assemblage of drinker under the sparkling light of their brilliantly illuminated fronts. Before them, on little round or square tables, glasses holding liquids, red, yellow, green, brown and all shades and side decanters one saw glittering large transparent cylinders i ice which cooled the bright clear water.

Duroy had slackened his pace, and desire for a drink ried up his throat. A burning thirst, the thirst of an evening summer time gripped him, and he thought of the lovely ensation of cold drinks flowing down his throat. But, if he rank even just two bocks in the evening, good-bye to the ugal supper of to-morrow, and he knew only too well ungry hours, of the end of the month. He said to himself: All I have to do is to hang on for ten hours and I will ave my bock à l'Américain. Name of a dog! How thirsty I m, all the same!" And he gazed at all those men seated and rinking, all those men who could quench their thirst as much s they liked. He strolled along, passing before the cafés with swaggering, jovial air and estimated at a glance, from ppearance, manner, attire, how much money each reveller had a him. And anger choked him against the crowd of them ated and smug there. Going through their pockets one would On an average each must have at nd gold, silver, copper. east two louis, there were certainly a hundred of them in the afe; a hundred times two louis would be four thousand frames. Ie muttered; "The swine. Everyone of them throwing his reight about." If he could have got one of them at a street orner in the dark shadow he would have wrung his neek as heerfully as he had the peasants' chickens in the days of the fraud Manœuvres. And he recalled his two years in Africa. he way he had levied blackmail on the Arabs in those southern utposts. And a cruel and happy smile flitted across his lips is he remembered an escapade which had cost the lives of hree men of the tribe of Ouled-Alane and which had been worth to him and his mess-mates twenty fowls, two sheep, rold-something to chuckle over for six months afterwards. They never found the culprits; indeed they hardly looked for them, the Arab being deemed the soldier's natural prey. In Paris it was another matter. No chance of a bit of graceful looting, sword at one's side and revolver in hand, far from sivil jurisdiction, at liberty. He felt in his heart all the instincts of the freebooter let loose on a conquered countryside.

How he looked back on them now, those two years in the desert. What a fool not to have stayed there! But, there, he had hoped for better things, coming back. And now! Ah! Yes, now; well, there he was! He rolled his tongue in his mouth with a little click as if to proclaim the dryness of his throat. The throng moved around him, bored and cumbrous and he thought all the time. "Set of brutes! Every idiot there has money in his pocket." He ran up against the men and whistled bright little tunes. The gentlemen jostled, recovered them selves grumbling; their wives called him an animal. He passed before the Vaudeville and stopped in front of the Cafe Américain, asking himself if he must not take his bock, his thirst now actual torture. Before deciding he looked at the time on the luminous clocks in the middle of the street. It was a quarter past nine. He knew himself. The moment the glass, full of beer, was before him he would swallow it down at a gulp. Then what was he to do afterwards?

He paused: "I'll go as far as la Madeleine," he said, "and then go home."

As he arrived at the corner of the Place de l'Opéra he spiel a stout young man whom he remembered vaguely having been somewhere before. He started to follow him, searching in his mind for some clue and saying sotto voce: "Now, where the devil have I met that fellow?" He ransacked his memory uselessly; then suddenly, by an odd freak of memory he visualized the same man, thinner, younger rigged out in Hussar's uniform. Of course, Forestier! Increasing his pace he tapped him on the shoulder. The other turned, gave him a glance and said: "What can I do for you sir?" Duroy burst into a laugh: "You don't recognize me?"

" No."

"Georges Duroy of the 6th Hussars."

Forestier gripped both his hands: "Well! Well! old chap, and how goes it with you?"

"Very well, and what about you?"

"Not too good. Fancy me with chest trouble! But I've got it. I cough six months out of the twelve. That bronchitis caused it. You remember it got me in Bougival he year I came back to Paris. Four years of it now. Well you look solid enough anyway."

Whereupon Forestier, taking his old comrade's arm launched orth on the details of his illness, on consultations, opinions, loctors' verdicts and the difficulty of doing what they told him in his position. He was ordered to pass the winter in the South; but how could he? He was married and a journalist in a good job.

I am in charge of the political side for la Vic Française. I do the Senate for the Salute and the literary column for the Planet. So you see, I've got on." Duroy looked at him. He was astonished. The man was completely changed. He was matured; he had poise, carriage, the assurance of one firmly established, and a stomach on him too, of a man who dines well. He used to be thin, weedy, irresponsible, feekless, a bit of a bully too, roystering, always in trouble. Three years in Paris had turned him into a different being, somebody stout, a bit snug and going grey at the temples though he could not be more than twenty-seven.

He asked: "Where are you off to?"

"Nowhere. I was just having a stroll before turning in. I'll tell you what. I've some proofs to run through at la Vie Française. Come along with me there. Then we'll have a bock together."

"I'm your man!",

And they walked off arm in arm with that easy (amiliarity which exists between old school fellows and between comrades in arms.

"What are you up to in Paris?" asked Forestier.

Duroy shrugged his shoulders. "I die of hunger, just that. Once my time was up I always wanted to come to Paris to...to, well to make my fortune or rather just to live in Paris; and here I am on an office job in the Northern Railway for the last six months at fifteen hundred francs a year and not a centime more!"

Forestier grunted sympathetically. "Hell," he said. "You can't get fat on that."

"You're right. But how can I pull myself out of it?" I'm on my own. I don't know a soul. I can't go about recommending myself to people. It's not the will that's lacking. It's the means."

His chum looked him up and down from head to foot in the manner of the man of common sense who knows his subject, then pronounced his verdict with entire conviction "You see, old chap, here everything depends on assurance poise, aplomb. A man with a little shrewdness can more easily become a Cabinet Minister than an office manager, You've got to force yourself on people, not be a supplicant, But how the devil is it you haven't found yourself a better iob than the Northern?"

Duroy answered: "I have looked everywhere and found nothing. But I've something in view at this very moment I've been offered the job of riding master in Pellerin's School.

There I shall get at least three thousand francs."

Forestier stopped short. "Don't take it. Sheer stupidity. when you ought to get ten thousand francs. You destroy your whole future with one blow. In your office you are at least hidden away, a nobody, not a soul knows you. can walk out if you've got any pluck and make your own way. But, once you are a riding master you're done for. It's just as if you were a buttler in a house where all Paris dines. When you have given riding lessons to men of the world or their daughters how can they get used to looking on you as an equal?"

He became silent, thought a little, then demanded:

"Are you a graduate?" "No. I failed twice."

That doesn't matter; from this moment you have pursued your studies to the end. If someone talks about Cicero or the Tiber, I suppose you've got some idea of what he's saying?

"Yes, a little perhaps."

Good. No one knows any more, except a score or so of fools no one bothers about. It's not difficult to pass as a highbrow; the whole thing is not to be caught out in some flagrant exhibition of ignorance. One works round a thing, steps by a difficulty, goes round an obstacle, by-passes trouble. Men, all the lot of them, are stupid as geese and ignorant as gros."

He spoke like a jovial cynic who knows life, and smiled as looked on the passing crowd. But suddenly a fit of coughing seized him and when it was over he went on in gloomy fin. "Isn't it a bore not being able to get rid of this ough? And here we are in mid summer. Oh! this winter all take the cure at Mentone. It's getting worse too. call before everything, damn it."

They reached the boulevard Poissonnière, and a large glass borway before which an open newspaper was spread out. hree people had stopped there reading it. Above the gate as displayed in great fiery illuminated letters la Vic Française. Ind pedestrians passing suddenly into the glare which these hree flaming words threw around them appeared suddenly it full view, clear, plain, distinct as high noon, then withdrew again into the shadow.

A Forestier pushed open the door. "Come in," said he. Duroy ollowed him, climbed a staircase, gaudy and dirty, which werlooked the whole street, passed into an ante-chamber in which two clerks greeted his comrade, then stopped in a kind if waiting hall, dusty and shaggy, hung with artificial velvet if a mouldy green, riddled, spotted and in holes as if the like had been nibbling them.

"Sit down" said Forestier, "I'll be back in five minutes." and he disappeared through one of the three doors, eculiar, strange, indescribable odour. the ditorial sanctums permeated the place. Durov remained actionless, a little nervous, altogether confused. From time time men would pass before him, running in at one door and out at the other before he could even give them a glance. Sometimes these were young men, mere youths but with keen jusiness looks, holding in their hands sheets of paper which rembled in the breeze of their tempestuous progress; or compositors whose inkstained working blouses allowed one a glimpse of a snow white collar and shirt and neat trousers is trun as any business man's; sometimes a perfect little gentleman would enter, dressed just a trifle too elegantly, figure squeezed in just a trifle too much at the waist of he frock coat; foot displayed in a shoe just a trifle too pointed leg a trifle too tightly encased in its wrapping, some worldling reporter bringing in the echoes of the evening. Other arrived, solemn important fellows complete with tall has with flat rims as if the latter set them apart from the rest of mankind.

Forestier reappeared, holding by the arm a tall thin fello between thirty and forty, in a black coat with white tie, ve swarthy, pointed moustache and a supercilious, insolent, se satisfied manner. Forestier said to him, "Good-bye Chief and the other giving him a handshake answered. "So low dearie," and went down the stairs whistling, cane under an

"Who's that?" asked Duroy.

"That's Jacques Rival, the famous columnist, the duelli He's come to run over his proofs. Garin, Montel and lare the Big Three in the columnist world in Paris. He mak thirty thousand frames a year for two articles a week."

As they went out they ran into a fat, clumsy, long hair little man who went wheezing and panting up the steps.

Forestier greeted him with profound respect. "Norbe de Varenne, the poet, author of Stagnant Suns, one of the vertop-notchers. Every poem he turns out brings him in the hundred frances and the longest don't run to more than couple of hundred lines. But let's go in the Napolitain, I beginning to raise a thirst."

As soon as they were seated Forestier called "Two Bocks and swallowed his own with one gulp, while Duroy drag the beer by slow draughts, sipping and savouring it, lit something priceless and rare. His companion was silen seemed thoughtful, then suddenly said: "Why don't you have a shot at journalism?" Duroy looked at him bewildered "But...how can.. I've never written a line."

"Bah! One tries, one begins. Why I myself could employou to search out 'scoops' for me, make appointments, pa calls. You'd start at two hundred and fifty frames and you expenses. Would you like me to speak to the Director?"

"Yes, rather, I should very much."

"Then do one thing, come and dine with me to-morrow. ve only five or six guests. The governor, Mons Walter, s wife, Jacques Rival and Norbert de Varenne, the fellow m've just seen, and a friend of my wife's. Agreed?"

Duroy hesitated and reddened. He muttered at last. "1-haven't any dinner kit."

Forestier was absolutely dumbfounded: "What?" he said No dinner kit. Hell! It's the one solitary thing you can't) without. Get this. In Paris you can much better do ithout a bed than a dress suit."

Then suddenly, exploring his waist-coat pocket, he drew it some gold pieces, took two louis and placed them before sold comrade in arms very frankly and unaffectedly. "You in pay me back when you can. Hire the clothes or buy in on monthly terms; any way fix yourself up and dine at y place to-morrow, seven-thirty, 17, rue Fontaine."

Duroy, embarrassed, picked up the money, "It's more an good of you," he stammered, "I'm very grateful, you ay be sure I'll not forget...." The other interrupted, Right, that's good. Another bock, eh! Waiter, two bocks." hen, when they had finished he asked: "You'd like an hour's roll?" and Duroy agreeing, they set off towards la Madeleine. "What shall we do?" asked Forestier. "We pretend that Paris the idler can always find something; its' not true. Their I want to stroll around in the evening I never know here to go. A turn in the Bois is only fun if you have a oman with you, and a woman's not always ready at hand; we café concerts may suit my chemist and his wife but they on't suit me. Well, what else is there? Nothing, ight to have a summer garden there, like Monceau park, pen all night, where we could listen to the very best music ad drink the choicest wines under the trees. It wouldn't a pleasure resort, but a leisure resort; with a stiff entrance rarge to draw the very finest women. It would need a really wely garden and a tremendously big one. It would be slightful. Where do you want to go!"

Duroy, quite at sea, didn't know what to suggest; at 's answered. 'I don't know the Polies-Bergère. I w mind looking in there."

His companion scoffed, but agreed: "Well! Well! To Folies-Bergère! We shall be cooked to a frazzle there. Anywa it's funny there sometimes." So they turned round and mad for la rue Faubourg Montmarte.

The illuminated front of the show cast a tremendous light on the four streets that converged upon it. A row of call were drawn up at the exit.

Forestier was going in, when Duroy stopped him. "We's forgotten to pay," and the other replied grandiloquently

"With me, no one pays."

As they drew near the ticket office the three official there greeted him. The middle one extended his hand The journalist demanded: "Have you a good seat?" "Yes certainly Mons Forestier." He accepted the ticket given him, pushed open the curtained door and they found themselves in the auditorium.

A cloud of tobacco smoke, veiled the stage a little and the other side of the theatre. And rising 'ceaselessly in slends whitish threads from all the eigars and eigarettes which the whole male audience were smoking, this light haze climbed upwards, collected at the ceiling and formed under the hug dome around the chandelier below the gallery a gloomy sky of smoke.

In the vast entrance corridor, which leads to the promenace where prowl the bedizened tribe of girls of the town jumbled amongst the dense crowd of men, a group of women waited new arrivals before one of three counters; where the presided, painted and jaded, three traders in wines and it love. Tall mirrors behind them reflected their backs and the faces of those passing.

Forestier made for these counters, walking importantly like a man who counts. He approached one of the women eashiers

"Box 27" he said.

"This way, monsieur." And she shut them in a tiny wooder box, oren, upholstered in red, containing four chairs of the same colour so close together that it was almost impossible to make one's way between them. The two friends sat down and their right and left following a long line jutting upon the age at its two ends was a collection of similar boxes, filled ith men similarly seated of whom one could see only the ead and chest.

On the stage three young men in tights, one tall, one middle zed and the third a little fellow were doing a trapeze act. ut Duroy paid hardly any attention to the turn, and with ad averted from it could not keep his eyes even for a oment from the grand Promenade behind him full of men ad prostitutes.

Forestier said to him "Have a look at the Orchestra stalls, othing there but John Citizen with his wife and his children, orthy chuckle-headed stupid louts who come merely to see ie show. In the boxes, men about town, some artists, some midway and between 'women; and behind them the oddest ollection in Paris. What are these men? Look at them losely. They are of every kind, of every profession, of every aste, but sheer vulgar vice rules. Here they are, work-a-day cople, bank clerks, shop assistants, civil servants, reporters, fficers in mufti and then in addition a crowd of weird male uspects who defy analysis. As for the women I've known very one of them these six years; one sees them evening after vening in the same streets all the year round, except when hey're undergoing venercal treatment at St. Lazare or fourcine."

Duroy was no longer paying attention. One of the women, eaning her elbow on their box was eyeing him. She was fat with a sallow face whitened by powder, long black eyes, heaving pencilled, framed under enormous artificial eyebrows. Her obust heavy breasts strained the dark silk of her dress; and her painted lips, crimson, like a bloody wound, gave her something bestial, scorehing, repellent, but which inflamed lust none the less.

With a nod of her head she beckoned one of her friends passing, a fleshy red haired blonde and said to her in a voice oud enough for him to hear: "There's a chap who looks a sport: if he wants me for ten louis I shan't say no."

Forestier turned round and smiled, tapping Duroy on the thigh. "That's for you my lad; you've a success. Congrutulations."

The ex-Sergeant Major had reddened; and with mechanical movement of his finger handled the two go pieces in his vest pocket.

The curtain was lowered; the orchestra was starting waltz.

Duroy suggested a turn in the gallery and they we immediately swept up in the current of promenader Pressed, jostled, squeezed, elbowed they went along, before their eyes a sea of hats. And the women in this crow of men, two by two, were passing and crossing with the greatest ease gliding between elbows and stomachs as backs as if they were at home there, like fish in water, qui nonchalant in the midst of this torrent of males.

Duroy, fascinated, let himself be carried along, and gulpe down drunkenly the foul air, tainted by tobacco, by hums odour and the stale perfumes of the lights o' love.

But Forestier sweated and, gasped and coughed,

"Let's get into the garden," he said.

"What about another bock?" It was Forestier's sugestion and they sat down watching the passing shot Occasionally a prowler would accost them, asking will stereotyped smile: "Will you buy me a drink Monsieur? and on Forestier suggesting "a glass of water at the fountain, would move off, muttering." Then go there yourself, Pig-face.

But the plump, swarthy woman who had been leaning against their box turned up again walking arrogantly, he arm passed under that of the stout blonde. In their was they really made a fine pair of women, contrasting well.

She smiled on seeing Duroy as if their eyes had alread spoken of intimate and secret things; and taking a character she sat down composedly in front of him, and making he friend six down too she gave her order in a clear voic "Waiter, two grenadines." Forestier, surprised, said some thing and she answered: "It's your friend. He intrigue me. I really believe he could induce me to make a fool of myself."

Duroy, taken aback, couldn't find a word to say. He inned owlishly, twirling his moustache. The waiter ought the syrups which the women drank at a draught d then got up; and the swarthy one with a friendly, little d of her head and a light tap on the arm from her fan said Duroy: "Thanks Lovey. You are not exactly verbose:" d they went off swaying their buttocks. Forestier began laugh. "There you are, my lad. Do you realize you are ally a success with women? That's worth developing. It ight take you far. Through the ladies one can get there are quickly."

And as Duroy continued to smile without replying he ked: "Are you going to stay here? I'm going home, I've d enough of it."

"Yes, I'll stay a little. It's not late."

Forestier got up. "Right! Good-bye then. To-morrow. on't forget. 17 rue Fontaine, seven-thirty."

"Yes, till to-morrow and thanks."

They shook hands and the journalist left.

The moment he'd gone Duroy felt free and again he gleelly jingled the two gold pieces in his pocket: then, getting to he mixed with the crowd, ransacking it with his eye. He we them presently, the blonde and the brunette who had sumed their ceaseless promenade like haughty mendicants in mob of men.

He went straight up to them and stuck there tongue-tied, ie brunette said: "Have you found your tongue yet?" He spluttered "Parbleu" and couldn't get out another ord. Then quite suddenly she demanded: "Are you comg home with me?"

"Yes," he answered, "but I've only one louis in my beket." She smiled indifferently: "That doesn't matter," at took his arm in token of possession. As they went out he ld himself that the other twenty francs would easily protre him a dress suit for the morrow, on hire.

(HAPTER II

"Where is Mons Forestier's place please?"
"The third door on the left."

The concierge had answered pleasantly in a tone whi seemed to indicate respect for his tenant; and Duroy climbed the staircase. He was a little mervous, ill at ease. He was wearing a dress suit for f first time in his life and the general effect disturbed him I felt something was wrong everywhere; his shoes were n patent leather, though a good enough shape, for he prid himself on good taste in footwear, the front of his shi which he had bought that morning at the Louvre, was t tight and already splitting. His other everyday shirts we all so worn out that he couldn't use even the least dilar dated of them. His trousers a bit too large, badly fitting the legs seemed to roll itself round his calves and had the rumpled look which hired clothes present to the limbs the chance to cover. The coat, alone, was not too bad, beil almost an exact fit.

He went slowly up the stairs, heart hammering, worried mind, with the galling fear of looking ridiculous: and si denly he came face to face with a magnificent gentleman glorious apparel who was looking at him. This being w himself reflected in a tall mirror on the first floor landing A start of pure joy shook him, he looked so incredibly bett than he had imagined possible. At home he possessed on a tiny shaving glass and surveying with increasing gloo each separate part of his improvised toilet he had exaggerate its imperfections and worried himself into the idea that looked grotesque. Actually and literally, seeing himse unexpectedly in the mirror he had not recognized himsel he had taken himself for someone else, for some society me and a pretty smart and distinguished one at that. He has a good long careful look at himself and found the resu altogether satisfactory.

Then he rehearsed himself as actors do, learning their parts. e smiled at himself, held out his hand to himself, gestiportrayed sentiments; astonishment, pleasure. proval; and he sought for the meaning smile, the speaking ance, to cut a figure with the ladies to make them know at Georges Duroy worshipped them and that he desired A door opened on the landing. He fled up the stairs ith great speed, terrified by the fear of having been seen mirking in the glass by some guest of his friend's. On the cond floor be came to another mirror and slowed down to atch himself pass. His appearance seemed to him the last ord in style. He carried himself well, and a terrific confiance in himself suddenly filled him. Not a doubt about , he must succeed with that figure, that desire to here, that will to win, that independent spirit. He wanted run, to leap the climb to the last floor. He halted before third mirror, twisted his moustache with a characteristic ovement, took off his hat to pat down his hair, and mururing to himself, a habit of his, "Here we go," stretched it his hand to the bell and rang it.

The door opened almost at once in the presence of a butler t black livery, solemn, close shaved, of such an immaculate size that Duroy lost his nerve again without understanding there his vague discomfort came from; an unconscious comparison perhaps between the cut of their clothes. This tekey who had on patent leather shoes, took the overcoat hich Duroy was not wearing but carrying on his arm to hide a stains, asked whom he was to announce, and proclaimed to mame into a room which one entered from behind a heavy artain.

But Duroy, all his assurance suddenly gone, halted, petrified ith shyness. He had to take his first step into an existnce longed for, dreamed of. He managed to step toward.
If air young woman was standing quite alone waiting for im in a large room as full of fernery as a conservatory. He pulled up short totally discongerted. Who was this lady miling at him? Then he remembered that Forestier was married and the thought that this lovely fair-haired fashionable girl must be his friend's wife completed his discomfitu He stammered "Madame, I am ... ," when she held on her hand.

17

"I know it Monsieur. Charles told me of your meeting yesterday evening and I'm very glad he thought of asking you to dine with us to-day." He blushed to his ears, no knowing what to say; and felt himself being examined from head to foot, weighed up, judged. He wanted to make of cuses for himself, to invent some reason to explain the des ciercies in his dress. But he found none and dared no touch upon the awkward subject. He sat down in an an chair she indicated and as he felt the soft springy vely give under him and its comfortable relaxed support, it seem ed to him that he entered a new and delightful life, that took possession of something delectable, that he himself became someone, that he was saved; and he looked at Madam Forestier whose eyes had not left him for a single moment She had on a dress of pale Kashmir blue, which suited he supple form and full figure well. Her arms and throat emerged from a cloud of white lace trimming her corsage and short sleeves; and her hair, naturally twayy with time curls at her neck, enveloped her head in a lovely light down haze.

Duroy pulled himself together under her scrutiny, which recalled to him without his knowing why that of the women of the Folies-Bergère the night before.

Each of them had grey eyes, that sky-grey colour giving remote expression, thin nose, full lips, rather fleshy chin irregular seductive figure, graceful and provocative. had one of those faces every line of which reveals a special charm and of which every little movement seems to say some thing or hide something.

After a short silence she asked him: "Have you been in Park long?" Little by little getting a hold on himself he answered: "Only a few months, madame. I'm working on the rail way; but Forestier has given me hopes that with his help I might have a shot at journalism." She had a very open good natured smile. "I know", she said softly.

The valet announced: "Madame de Marelle." It was a tle brunette. She came in with sharp allure; she seemed to a model, moulded from head to foot in a very simple ack dress. One single rose in her black hair, drew one's olent attention, like a mark of character, seeming to accentate some special attribute to give her the live abrupt note e wanted.

A young girl in a short frock followed her. Mme Forestier arted across. "Good day, Clotilde."

"Good day, Madeleine."

They embraced. Then the girl patted herself tidy with I the assurance of the Great Lady, and Mme Forestier made e introductions.

"Mons Georges Duroy, a great friend of Charles; Mme de arelle, my friend and kinswoman."

She added: "You know, we're here without ceremony, thout affectation and without show. That's understood, i't it?" And the young man acknowledged it with a bow. The door opened again, and a little fat gentleman appeared, ort and round, giving his arm to a distinguished looking d beautiful woman, taller and very much younger than, with the grand manner and a sombre charm, It was M alter, Deputy, financier, man of money and business, Jew and autherner, director of la Vic Française and his wife, formerly usile-Rayalau, daughter of the banker of that name.

Then entered, side by side—Jacques Rival, very gant, and Norbert de Varenne, his dress collar a little iled by the friction of his long hair which tumbled almost his shoulders. His tie, clumsily twisted on didn't seem to on its first outing. He came forward with the grace of old dandy and taking Mme Forestier's hand, planted a kiss on her wrist; and in the kissing movement his long hair read out like a shower of water over the young woman's re arm. Then Forestier came in with excuses for being the property of the had been detained by Unffaire Morel. M Morel e radical Deputy was going to question the Minister upon a credit vote for the Algerian colonization scheme.

Duroy found himself seated between Mme de Marelle and her daughter. He felt awkward again, afraid of making some mistake in the management knife or fork or glasses. He had four of the latterinted a light blue. What was he to drink in that?

No one spoke a word during the soup course. Norbert de Varenne asked: "Have you read the Garage case? What a comic business!"

And they debated this case of Adultery-cum-Black not at all as one speaks in the bosom of one's famevents recounted in the daily press, but as one discusdisease amongst medical men or vegetables amongst grocers. Not one was indignant, not one amazed by facts. They sought out the inner secret causes with professional curiosity and with absolute indifference to the crime They set out on a frank explanation of the reasons for actions, to settle all the scientific phenomena out of the drama was born, the pathological result of a part state of mind. The women also threw themselves into exercise, this task. And other events were examined, commerted on, turned inside out and side down, estimated at their precise value with that tised glance, that peculiar specialized insight of the ha of news, the retailers of the human comedy by the line as in the tradesman's world they examine, turn over price the goods they're going to sell to the public.

Then there was the matter of a duel and Jacques Rival the stage. That was his province; no one else could with it.

Duroy dared not put in a word. All the time he was ing at his neighbour whose rounded shoulders fascinhim. Her diamond earring with its golden thread glishinke a sparkling drop of water. Occasionally she thread witty comment which always evoked a smile from every one. She possessed a sardonic, pleasing unstudied with the mind of an experienced tomboy who surveys things sums them up with a sort of careless, light genial cynical

It was a good dinner and everyone enjoyed it. M Was eating like an ogre hardly spoke, and with eyes green stening under his spectacles pondered over every course, orbert de Varenne kept silence and spattered his shirt from th sauce and gravy.

Forestier, smiling and serious, superintended, exchanging derstanding glances with his wife, like a couple of business retners conscientiously earrying through a difficult deal.

Faces reddened and voices thickened; and all the time the after whispered his hint: "Corton... Chateau Laroze?" Duroy discovered he liked Corton and let his glass be led again and again. A most delightful cheerfulness took ssession of him; a warm expansive gaiety which climbed from stomach to head, ran through every limb, permeathis whole being. He wanted to speak, to deliver an orain, to be listened to, to be appreciated like those men whose thtest word is hung upon with rapture.

But the chatter went or ceaselessly, jumping from one ea to another, leaping at a chance word from subject to bject, skirting every single event of the day and skimming e surface of a thousand topics.

M Walter between the courses made a joke or two, for he as not without a certain coarse, sareastic humour. Forestier tailed his article of the morrow. Jacques Rival advocatl a military government, with grants of land to all officers ter thirty years' service.

"In this way," said he "you will create a live community, hich by its long experience will have learnt to know the puntry and love it, and be conversant with all those grave cal customs which newcomers invariably come to grief ær."

Norbert de Varenne interrupted him.

"Yes.... they'll know everything except agriculture, hey'll speak Arabic but they won't know how to transplant beet-root or sow corn. They will be very strong in fencing at precious feeble in manure. What is wanted is to open is new country to everyone. Men with brains will make a lace for themselves there. The others will go under. It's re-social law."

Georges Duroy to his own astonishment then opened his mouth and held forth. He was surprised by the sound of his own voice, as if he had never heard bimself speak before.

"What is lacking there most is good soil. The really fertile parts cost as much as in France and are brought up as investments by wealthy Parisians. The real colonists, the poor, who bury themselves there for lack of bread are chucked into the desert, where they can't get on for lack of water."

Everyone started at him. He knew he was blushing. Walter asked him: "You know Algiers, Monsieur?"

He replied, "Yes, Monsieur, I was there twenty-eight months and stayed in all three provinces."

And bluntly ignoring the Morel matter Norbert de Varenne questioned him about a point of custom that he had obtained from an officer. It concerned Mzab, that strange little Arab republic right in the middle of the Sahara in the most arif part of that burning desert. Duroy had twice visited Mzah and he told of the customs of this singular country where drops of water have the value of gold. He spoke with a vertain boastful racy warmth and vigour stimulated by the wine and the wish to please : and he managed in vivid colourful words to bring before them those gaunt yellow regions for ever desolate under the sun's devouring flame. All the women had their eyes fixed on him. Mme Walter murmured in her slow drawl: "You could make a most charming series of articles out of those recollections." Then Walter peered at the young man from above the rim of his glasses and had a good look at him. Duroy looked down at the dishes. Forestier seized the opportunity: "My dear Director, I have so often spoken to you of Georges Duroy and asked you to let him assist me on the political information side. Since Marambot left us I've had no one to do urgent and confidential assignments the paper's losing by it." Daddy Walter became serious and suddenly raised his glasses to look Duroy full in the face, Then he said: "Mr. Duroy's got an original mind, that's certain. If he'd care to come and have a chat with me tomorrow at three o'clock we will fix it up." Then, after a a pause and turning towards the young man, he added : "But do, right away, a short witty series on Algeria. You can Il your reminiscences and bring in the colonization question; the same time. What we want is realism, make it realistic I the time and I'm certain it will go down well with our aders. But hurry up. To draw the public we must have a first article to-morrow or the day after while they are equally discussing the scheme in the Chamber.

Mme Walter added with that grave charm which she put to everything and which gave to every syllable the semblance 'a favour conferred. 'And you have a delightful title, even't you! Sourcairs d'un Chasseur d'Afrique, Don't you ink so, Monsieur de Norbert?"

But the old poet, who had attained fame late in life and who stested and despised newcomers replied dryly. "Yes, cellent, provided the result has style, for that's the main ifficulty; the exact note, what musicians call tone."

Mme Forestier gave Duroy a protective smiling look, that an expert and it seemed to say: "you've arrived." Mme a Marelle turned to him the diamond in her car trembling easelessly as if the tiny globule of water was about to detach self and fall.

The little girl remained quiet and serious, her head bent ver her plate.

The servant was going round the table, pouring Johannesarg wine into the blue glasses; and Forestier proposed a past coupling Mons Walter's name with it: "To the centinued rosperity of la Vie Française!!

Everyone turned towards the Director who was smiling, and Duroy, pale with triumph drank his at a draught. He could similarly have drunk a whole barrel, devoured a bull, trangled a lion, as it seemed to him then. He felt in his limbs aperhuman vigour, in his mind unconquerable resolve and afinite hope. He was in his element now amongst these cople; he was about to take up his position there, to win his clace. He surveyed the faces round him with a new assurance; ... and he dared for the first time to address a word to his ceighbour.

em." She turned to him, smiling: "It's my own idea to hang the diamonds like that, simply by a thread. It remin one of the dew, doesn't it?"

He murmured, confused by his audaeity and afraid committing a $b\acute{e}tise$; "It is charming....but it is the e that makes the gem worth while."

She rewarded him with a look, one of those straight clear loo penetrating to the heart which some women can give.

And, as he turned his head he met the eyes of Ma Forestier, quite friendly, but he thought he saw in them lively amusement, bright malice, encouragement. The material waver all talking at the same time now, with gestures at raised voices. They were discussing the great scheme for Metropolitan railway. The subject only talked itself out the end of dessert, everyone of them having something contribute about the slowness of communications in Paris, the inconvenience of trams, the boredom of buses and the impactness of cab drivers. Then they left the dining room facoffee. Duroy, jokingly, offered his arm to the little girl. Stanked him solemnly and hoisted herself on tiptoe to plan her hand within his arm.

Entering the drawing room, again one had the feeling going into a greenhouse. Great palms opened their state leaves in every corner of the room, climbing almost to the oeiling. The air was fresh, and permeated with a vaguelicate perfume, indefinable and to which one could be give a name.

And the young man, more master of himself now, examine the room attentively. There was nothing grand about it nothing particularly striking except the ferns; but one fel at one's ease in it, one was quiet, rested; it softly surrounde one, it pleased one, seemed to touch one's body with some thing like a caress.

"Will you have coffee, Monsieur Duroy?"

And Mme Forestier handed him a cup with that friendly smile which never left her lips. He received his cup and a he bent to pick up with the silver tongs a lump of sugar the young woman whispered to him. "Pay your court to Mme Walter;" and she was gone before he could say a word.

He drank his coffee straight off because he was afraid of opping it on the carpet; then, more at ease, he sought a cans of approaching the wife of his new employer and gaging her in conversation. Suddenly he noticed she was olding an empty cup; and, being some way from a table dn't know where to put it. He darted forward.

"Allow me, Madame."

"Thank you, Monsieur."
He took the cup away and returned: "If you only knew, ladame, what happy moments la Vic Française has given a when I was there, in the desert. It is really the only aper one can read away from France because it is so much nore literary, so much more enlightened, so much less boring nan the others. One finds everything in it." She smiled with sevene indifference and answered seriously.

"M Walter has had a good deal of trouble creating this vpe of journal which supplies a real need."

They started to chat. He had an easy, if banal, fluency, a ery attractive voice and a certain charm of look and carriage. They spoke of Paris, its neighbourhood, the barks of the eine, watering places, the pleasures of summer, all the commonplaces on which one can chatter interminably without atigue.

Then, as Norbert de Varenne approached, a liqueur glass in is hand, Duroy discreetly withdrew.

Mme de Marelle, talking to Mme Forestier called him: Well, Monsieur," she said bluntly, "so you want to dabble n journalism."

He spoke of his plans in vague terms and went through gain, with her, the whole conversation that he had just had with Mme Walter; but, as he had mastered his subject better by now, he put on an improved show, largely by repeating as its own, the things that he had been told a few moments before. And all the time, he looked into her eyes, as if to rive a deeper meaning to what he said.

She, on her side, told him anecdetes, with an easy warmth, hat of a woman who knows herself to be witty and intends always to be funny, and, becoming familiar she put her hand on his arm, lowered her voice to say things giving an appe ance of intimacy. It thrilled him immensely to flirt w this young woman. Suddenly he wished he could dev himself to her, defend her, show her what he was worth; the looks that he threw into his replies to her indicated w his thoughts were.

But, quite abruptly, without any reason, Mme de Mare called: "Laurine" and the little girl came across to her. "Sit down here, dear, you'll be cold near the window."

And Duroy was taken with a ridiculous impulse to embra the child as if something of the kiss might pass on to t mother.

He asked in a courtly, paternal tone: "Will you permit ! to embrace you, Mademoiselle?"

The child raised her eyes to his with a look of surpris Mme de Marelle, much amused said : "Answer him... You can kiss her to-day Monsieur; but you won't always allowed to."

Duroy sat down and took Laurine on his knee, lightly kis ing the child's lips and lovely wavy hair.

The mother was astounded: "Look, she's not runnir away. It's amazing. She never lets anyone kiss her women. You are irresistible, Monsieur Duroy."

He blushed without reply, and lightly rocked the little gi on his knee. Mme Forestier came up with a startled exch mation, "Well, well, Laurine tamed, what a miracle!" an Jacques Rival arriving, cigar in mouth, Duroy got up t leave, afraid of spoiling by some clumsy utterance, the wor of conquest he had begun. A soft, meaning pressure on th little hands of the women and a firm grip on the men's mark ed his departure. He noticed that Jacques Rival's hand wa dry and warm, firmly and cordially, responding to his own clasp; Norbert de Varenne's, damp and cold perspiring through the fingers; Daddy Walter's limp, flabby, expression less; Forestier's fleshy, tepid. Lowering his voice his friend reminded him.

"Don't forget, to-morrow 3 o'clock."

"No, not likely."

Outside, triumph surged through him; he could have flown wn the stairs and did leap down them two at a time: sudally seeing in one of the mirrors a frantic gentleman, sking and gambolling to meet him, he pulled up short, hamed as if he had been surprised in some crime.

Then he took a long look at himself, amazed that this really resonable fellow was himself; and with a smile a trifle smug d with that low ceremonious bow which one reserves for the great ones of the earth he bade farewell to his own age.

CHAPTER III

When Georges Duroy found himself in the street again hesitated what to do. What he would have preferred would have been to drift along breathing in the soft night air, musik and dreaming of his future, but the thought of the series articles required by Daddy Walter, held him and he mad up his mind to go home at once and start work.

He went back at a smart pace, reached the outer Boulevan and followed it to la rue Boursalt where he lived. The \hat{six} storied house was crammed with twenty common little working class families, and elimbing the stairs littered with spen matches, dirty foot prints, bits of paper, eigarette ends and food droppings he was seized with sickening distaste and frantic desire to get away from it all, and to live like th wealthy people he had left in a decent home in decent sur roundings. A filthy smell of decayed food, of water closels of the tumble down old building which no fresh current of air could drive away, filled the place from top to bottom.

The young man's room looked, as upon some vast abyss, ore the immense Great Western Railway lines just outside the tunnel by Batignolles station. Duroy opened the window and leaned out.

Below him, at the tunnel's gloomy mouth, three motionless red signal lights looked like the huge eyes of some beast, and farther and farther on he saw more and more of them. moment screaming whistles, long or short, hissed through the night air, some quite near, others barely audible from the d'Asnières side. One of them drew near now, wailing is mournful whine, increasing second by second and then with thunderous roar a great yellow light. Duroy watched the long chain of wagons engulf itself in the tunnel.

"Now to work," he said and placed his lamp on the table, but the moment he had settled down to write, found that he possessed nothing but a packet of note paper.

It would have to do. He would use that to open his masterace in all its grandeur. He dipped his pen in the ink and his very best script, wrote at the top.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A CHASSEUR D'AFRIQUE

ien began the search for the opening phrase.

He sat, head on hand, eyes fixed upon the white paper spread at in front of him.

What was he to say? He couldn't recall a thing now of all s reminiscences of a short while ago, not an anecdote, not a ord, nothing. Suddenly he thought "I must start with my marture," and wrote down: "It was in..., round about e 15th May when prostrate exhausted France rested after haie disasters of that ghastly year "

He stopped short not knowing how to lead up to what folwowed, his embarkation, the voyage, his first emotions.

After ten minutes' reflection to put off to the morrow the introductory opening and start now on a pen picture of . .lgiers.

And on the paper he wrote: "Algiers is a completely white ...ity ' without being able to describe another thing. In s iemory he saw again the lovely shining city, falling, like a ascade of flat houses, from her mountain into the sea but sould find not one solitary word to express what he had seen nd felt.

After a gigantic effort he added: "It is partly inhabited by Arabs" and then, putting his pen on the table, he rose.

In his little iron bed, in the hollow made by his body, he aw his everyday clothes where he had thrown them, shabby, worn, limp, pitiful like the livery of the dead house; and upon a wicker chair, his silk hat, his wonderful silk hat, open as if to receive alms. The walls were covered with grey wall paper with blue posies and as many stains as flowers, ancient unidentifiable stains, squashed bugs, drops of oil, greasy marks, slops splashed from the wash-hand basin. And hatred of his poverty-stricken life rose within him again. He must get out of it, he must finish with brutish existence from to-morrow. The impulse to work suddenly gripped him again and down he sat before his table, seeking phrases to portray the strange delights charm of Algiers, antechamber to vast, mysterious Africa Africa of nomad Arabs and unknown tribes. Africa un explored, inviting, of impossible legendary beasts, a costriches, huge birds, gazelles, unbelievable grotesque giraffes, solemn camels, the monstrous hippopotamus, shape less rhinoceros and man's terrifying brother the gorilla.

Thoughts of this kind came to him vaguely; perhaps he could have spoken them but not one word could he formulate in writing. And his impotence frenzied him; he stood up, hands damp with sweat and brain hammering. He eyes fell on his laundry bill, left there in the evening by the concierge. Instantly he was plunged into abandonment of despair. Happiness, self-confidence, hope for the future disappeared in a second. It was the end; everything was finished, he would never do anything, be anything; he fell himself incompetent, washed up, useless, damned.

He leaned out of the window again at the precise moment when a train emerged with startling unexpected roar from the tunnel; it was going across fields and plains to the sea And the memory of his parents entered Duroy's heart. It was going near them, this train, within a mile or so of their house. He saw it again, the tiny house at the top of the cliff, looking down on Rouen and the vast valley of the Seine

His father and mother kept a little tavern, a small road-side inm to which suburban worthies resorted on Sundays for lunch. They had wanted to make a gentleman of their son and sent him to college, which he left without a degree and joined the army. He was to be an officer—Captain, Colonel, General. But disgusted with military life, after completing his five years he had dreamed of making his fortune in Paris. And to Paris he had come the moment he was demobilized, regardless of the entreaties of the two old people, who, disillusioned, with their dream shattered, still wanted him with them. He banked his hopes on the future. Confused and muddled, yet he foresaw glorious triumph ahead. He was positive about it; saw it being born, rising. In the regiment he had achieved promotion, success and even nquests in higher spheres; there was the Income-tax an's daughter he had seduced who wanted to leave everying to follow him; the barrister's wife who had tried to own herself when he had thrown her over. A card, a rake, strategist who could extricate himself from any scrape, at was what his comrades said of him; and that, he told mself was what he would be, a card, a rake, a strategist, a native Norman wit, fed on the daily trickery of garrison 'e, African lootings, illicit affairs, cheating exploits, and so the soldier's peculiar code of honour, military swagger, triotic sentiments, real enough these in their way, bragging arns of the warrant officers' mess and the variety peculiar his profession, had become a sort of bottomless box in high he could find an answer to every emergency.

But ambition to succeed governed him in everything.

Without knowing it he had fallen into a reverie, his habit ery evening. He conjured up a glorious amorous advenre which at one stroke would lead him to the realisation of I his hopes. Some banker's daughter or a great nobleman's, cked up in the street, conquered at sight, married to him. He was startled out of his dream by the strident whistle an engine dashing out of the tunnel alone, like a huge bbit from its warren, making for the marshalling yard. sized again by this vague joyous hope, he threw a careee kiss into the night, a kiss of love to the dream woman, desire for the coming fortune. Then he shut the window id began to undress muttering to himself: "In the morreg Ill make a better job of it. I'm not in the right mood -night. Besides, perhaps I've had a drop too much. One n't work in that state." He got into bed, blew out his ght and was asleep in a second

He woke early, as one does in days of great hope or great exicty, and jumping out of bed, to swallow, as he put it, a ass of good fresh air. Then he remembered he must get work at once, and sent off the concierge's daughter with ten-sou tip to his office to say that he was ill. He satewin before his table, propped his chin in his hand and ught for ideas. In vain. Not a single one came.

But he was not downhearted. "Bah!" he thought, "T not used to it. It's the knack of it one wants. I shall ha to get help, the first time. I'll look up Forestier. He'll me on the track in ten minutes." He dressed himself, reflected that his friend would b In the street he sleeping late and it was much too early to show up at h house; so he dawdled slowly under the trees of the out Boulevard.

It was not yet nine when he reached Monceau part fragrant, fresh, just watered. Sitting down on one of i benches he fell dreaming again. A young man was patrid ing up and down before him, very smart and stylish, doub less waiting for a woman. She turned up, veiled, walking quickly, and after a hurried handshake, took his arm. The went off together. Tumultuous desire gripped Duroy; need for loves, aristocratic loves, perfumed, fastidious. got up and started off, thinking of Forestier's. Had he and chance in that direction? He reached his door just as h friend was going out.

"You here. At this hour! What's up!"

Duroy, embarrassed at meeting him just as he was lead ing, was at a loss,

"It's....It's....I can't get started on my article, yo know, that Algiers article for Mons Walter. It's in surprising really, seeing that I've never written anythin before. One wants practice, in this as in everything else I'm sure I shall do it quickly enough, but with this first attempt, I don't know how to set about it. I've plenty ideas. I'm full of them, but I can't put them into words."

He stopped, hesitating. Forestier smiled with a sort good humoured malice.

"I know that."

"Well I came...I came to ask you to lend me ! hand . . . In ten minutes you can put me on my feet i you'll just show me the trick of it. Just give me one good lesson in style and ther I can manage without you."

The other man, greatly amused, was still smiling. He tapped his old friend on the arm.

"Go up and see my wife. She'll look after you as well I could. I'm fixed up with work. I've no time at all is morning, otherwise I'd willingly do it for you."

Duroy hesitated, suddenly nervous.

"But at this hour I can't present myself to her."

"Yes, you can. She's up. You'll find her in my study thing some notes in order for me."

Duroy refused to go up.

"No....It's out of the question."

Forestier took him by the shoulders, pivoted him on his els and pushed him towards the staircase. "Be off, you s, and do as I tell you. You don't expect me to clamber three stories to present you and explain your case, do 11?"

Duroy decided to do it. "Thanks I'll go. But I shall I her you compelled me, absolutely forced me to come and

"Yes. Don't worry, she won't eat you. And don't forget, ree o'clock."

"Oh! not likely."

And Forestier went off, with his hurried air, while Duroy ent up, slowly stair by stair, wondering what he was to y and uneasy about the welcome he would receive.

A servant opened the door to him, blue-aproned and a com in her hand.

""Monsieur is out," she said not waiting to be questioned. "Ask Mme Forestier if she'll see me. Tell her I've me from her husband whom I've just met in the street," He waited. The woman returned, opened a door on the ght and announced him.

She was seated on an office chair in a little room, its alls completely hidden by books well arranged on wooden elves. The multicoloured bindings, red, yellow, green, olet, blue gave a touch of colour and warmth to the onotonous regularity of the books; she gave him her hand. towing a bare arm in its wide open sleeve. She had her variable smile.

"So early?" she said; then added: "Not a snub, question." He mumbled: "Oh Madame, I didn't want come up. But I met your husband downstairs and I forced me to. I'm so nervous I hardly dare tell you will came about."

She pointed to a chair: "Sit down and tell me."

She was nimbly twisting a quill pen between two finger and a page of foolscap, partly written on showed the your man what he had interrupted.

She seemed as much at home before this office table in her drawing room, like one engaged in everyday won A delicate scent was wafted from her peignoir triume with white lace, the fragrant perfume of one fresh from the bath; speculating on what the soft filmy material encealed he imagined he saw her young body, bright, plum warm.

As he said no more, she resumed: "Well, tell me what is."

He mumbled something, tongue-tied. Then: "The fact...but really...I can't tell you...I was working la night very late...and this morning...very early... on that Algiers article for M Walter...and I can't do thing...I've torn up all my attempts...I haven the knack of this sort of thing; and I came to ask Foresti to give a hand...just for once."

She interrupted him by a sudden burst of laughter, relaughter right from the heart, happy, joyous, exuberaflattered laughter. "And he told you to look me out." He nice of him."

"Yes, Madame. He told me that you could put me right better than he could....But I didn't dare, I didn't have the pluck. I'm sure you understand." Showse. "It's going to be quite charming to work togethe I'm delighted with the idea. Now, sit down in my play because the journal knows my writing; and we're going to tur out an article, yes, a success, an article worth while."

He sat down, took a pen, spread open a sheet of paper and waited. Mme Forestier leaned back, watching his make these preparations; then she took a cigarette from the ntelshelf and lighted it.

'I can't work without smoking. Now, let's see. What is ir story?"

He looked at her, astonished.

'But ... I don't know ... That's what I've come to you to I out.'

She replied: "Yes, I'll put in shape. I'll make the sauce vou must supply me with the plate."

Le hesitated, embarrassed. "I want to describe my voyage m the very beginning."

the sat down facing him, on the other side of the table, king him straight in the eyes.

Very well. First tell me about it, for my ear alone, you lerstand, just tell it simply in your own way, forgetting hing and I'll decide what to use."

But as he had no idea where to begin she began to question cas a priest in the confessional would have done, searching stions which brought back to him forgotten details, perages, meetings, events. When this eross-examination had æd about a quarter of an hour she suddenly stopped him. Now we're going to start. We will assume you are writyour impressions to a friend, a method which enables you let loose a lot of intimate footing, to make uncensored ments, to be natural as well as witty."

My dear Harry, you want to know what Algiers is like you shall. Having nothing to do in this dry little mud which is my dwelling, I'm going to send you a sort of rnal of my life, day by day, hour by hour. If it turns a bit on the lively side sometimes, no matter, you are not ged to show it to your lady friends" he stopped to relight her eigarette and at once the little iding squeak of the quill pen on the paper ceased too.

Carry on," she said.

Algeria is that great French domain on the frontiers of vast unknown country called the Desert, the Sahara. tral Africa

Algiers, glistening white is the port, the shining charming ; of this strange continent.

"But first one has to get there and it's no pienie. I remember Major Simbretas, we used to call Dr. Calomel. W we considered ourselves due for twenty-four hours' sick let blessed word, we used to look him up. You remember prescription: 'This soldier is suffering from stomach disor Administer Vomitive No. 5 according to my Formula; t twenty-four hours' leave. He will do well.'

"Well, old chap, to get to Africa I had to undergo for so forty hours another sort of irresistible Vomitive according the Formula of the Compagnic Transatlantique."

She got up and walked about, after lighting anot cigarette and dictated, blowing out straight waves of sm rings, scattering them with her open band or a sharp m of her finger, then watching the broken fragments fade as with grave scrutiny: and Duroy, eyes raised, would wa every action, every unstudied pose, every movement of supple body and of her face busied in this vague game wher thoughts elsewhere.

Then she pictured the vicissitudes of the voyage, portray travelling companions of her own invention, and launched on a love affair with the wife of an infantry captain go out to join her husband.

Seated again she cross-examined Duroy about the to graphy of Algiers. She was absolutely ignorant about it in ten minutes knew as much as he did, and fitted in a n little section on political and colonial geography to prepare the reader's understanding for the more serious questions be raised in subsequent articles.

Then she set out on an excursion into the province of Or a fantastic imaginary trip all about women, Moorish wom Jewesses, Spanish ladies. "Sex is what gets them always she observed.

She finished with a stay at Saida at the foot of the hiplateaus and a lively little intrigue between Warrant Office Georges Duroy and a Spanish work-girl employed in the Algrass factory at Ain-el-Hadjar. She held forth on the meing, the appointment, the night together on the bare roomountain, the jackals, hyenas and pariah dogs, seren

, laughing and barking amongst the crags.

Then she proclaimed happily: "The rest to-morrow!" And ing: "That's how you write an article, my dear sir. Sign sase."

He hesitated: "Sign?" Then he laughed and wrote at the tom of the page: "Georges Duroy."

She went on smoking and walking about; and he couldn't ce his eyes off her, filled with gratitude and sensual welling at this budding intimacy. It seemed to him that everying about her was part of her, everything, even the book rered walls. The furniture, the household goods, the tobacco ten air, all had something intimate, harmonious, graceful luctive coming from her.

Buddenly and peremptorily she demanded:

What do you think of my friend Mnte de Marelle?" He was surprised: "Well....I think....I think she's quite cinating."

" Yes, isn't she?"

'Very!'' He would have liked to add: "But not so much you are." He didn't dare.

She resumed: "And if you know how witty she is, so original intelligent. She's a Bohemian really, a true Bohemian. at's why her husband cares so little for her. He sees only faults and doesn't appreciate her good points."

Duroy was astounded to hear that Mme de Marelle had a sband, natural as it was that she should.

"Good Lord...is she married? What does her husband do?"

Mme Forestier raised her shoulders and eyebrows in a *sterious significant movement. "Oh! He's an inspector the Northern Railway. He spends only eight days of the with in Paris. His wife calls it 'Compulsory service' or the week's duty', or 'Holy week.' When you know her ter you will see what a dear she is. Go and see her one Duroy had no thought of leaving now; it seemed to him that could remain for ever, that this was his home.

But the door operfed noiselessly and a very magnificent resonage came in unannounced.

He pulled up on seeing another man. Mmc Forestier seem He pulled up on seeing another then she said, natural embarrassed just for a second; then she said, natural training dear the enough but blushing a little: "Come in dear Let enough but blushing a introduce one of Charles , great friends, M. Georges D_{Up} a journalist to be."

Then in a different tone: "Our best and most intimate frie the Count de Vaudrec."

The two men shook hands, each raking the other with eyes, and Duroy left at once. They didn't press him to st He stammered some words of thanks, touched the slend hand the young woman extended, bowed to the newcom with his cold impassive man of the world expression, awkwardly and clumsily as if he had just made a comple fool of himself.

In the street again, he felt worried, ill at case, with a que sense of frustration. He went along trying to account this unexpected depression. There was no reason for it; h ceaselessly before his eyes was the composed figure of Count de Vaudrec, ageing a little, grey at the temples, wi his air of cool insolence, the very rich man completely of himself. And he noticed that the arrival of this unknown breaking up a delightful tête-à-tête had produced that co dismal thwarted feeling which a word overheard, an unexpe ted snub, the most trifling setback often do produce. Mor over, it seemed to him, without knowing why it should be s that this man had been by no means pleased at finding hi there.

He had nothing to do till three o'clock; and it was not y noon. He had six francs odd in his pocket, so he lunched Duval's, had a stroll on the boulevard and punctually as the clock struck three climbed the stairs of la Vie Francuise.

Errand boys waited for jobs sitting cross-armed on a for while behind a sort of professorial desk a clerk sorted corre pondence just arrived. The setting was perfect, designed impress visitors. Everything had just the right touch poise, allure, dignity, style exactly suitable to the antechambe of a great newspaper.

Duroy said sharply: "M Walter please."

he clerk replied: "The Director is in conference. m a little, Monsieur," and ushered him to the waiting room ady full up. All sorts and conditions were there. Men note, solemn beribboned, important, and slovenly shirtless ividuals, coats buttoned up to the neck with stains on n like the tracings of continents and seas on geographical s. Three women crowded in with the men. One of them tty, smiling, well turned out, a cocotte by the look of her: neighbour a tragic mask, wrinkled, severely dressed with worn out artificial look of the old actress, a sort of false Aled youth, like scent turned rancid.

third woman in mourning with the sad desolate appeal of widow was in a corner. Duroy thought she looked as if had come to ask for alms. But they got no attention and e than twenty minutes passed. Then Duroy had an idea sought out the clerk: "M Walter gave me an appointit for three o'clock," said he "and, anyway, see if my rid M Forestier is here." They directed him down a long idor leading to a large hall where several gentlemen were ting at a big beige covered table.

orestier was standing before the fire-place, smoking a rette and playing bilboquet. He was extraordinarily ful at this game and at every shot coaxed the huge ball into tiny yellow box. He was counting: "Twenty-two...
Inty-three... Twenty-four... Twenty-five..."
Turoy added "Twenty-six," and his friend raised his eyes rout stopping the regular movement of his arm.

Oh there you are! Yesterday I scored fifty-seven straight Saint Potin's the only one that can give me a game. to you seen the boss? There is nothing so comic as to ch that o'd buffoon de Norbert play bilboquet. He opens mouth as if he's going to swallow the ball."

ne of the substurned round to him.

I say. Forestier, I know of one for sale, a real beauty, in They say it belonged to the Queen of Spain. going for sixty francs; that's not dear." Forestier anded: "Where is it?" And, as he broke down at his 1. Cup and ball.

thirty-seventh shot, he opened a cupboard in which D_{lb} saw a score of bilboquets or more numbered and meticulous arranged like a collection of jewels. Then, having placed instrument in its appointed place, he repeated: "Where is this masterpiece?"

The journalist answered: "At a stationer's shop by the Vaudeville. I'll bring it in to-morrow morning if you like,

"Right, do. If it's really a good one I'll take it; one can have too many bilboquets." Then turning to Duroy: "Coldinate of the control of th on. I'll take you in to the Boss. If I didn't you'd be han ing about here till seven this evening."

They crossed the waiting room. The same people waited the same order. The moment Forestier appeared the you woman and the old actress got up and came to him.

He took them, one after the other to the recess by the window and though they were careful to lower their voig Duroy noticed that they "thee'd and thou'd" one another.

Then, pushing the padded doors open they were in Director's sanctum. The "Conference" which had lasted hour was a game of écarté with some of the gentry who Duroy had met the evening before.

M Walter held and played his hand with crafty cautio while his opponents laid theirs down, picked them up and hel them with the supple skill of experienced players. Norbel de Varenne was writing an article in the editorial chair an Jacques Rival, eyes closed and stretched at full length on couch was smoking a cigar.

The place gave one that shut-in feeling; the leather of th furniture, the stale tobacco, the smell of printing; that pecu liar odour, the speciality of newspapers known to ever journalist.

Forestier shook hands with those gambling on the different players and without a word watched the game. The momen Daddy Walter had won he intervened.

"Here is my friend Duroy."

The director sharply considered the young man, his eye very bright behind his glasses. Then he demanded, "Have you brought my article? It'll fit in very well to morrow, a e same time as the Morel debate."

Duroy took the foolscap paper from his pocket.

"Here it is, sir."

M. Walter was delighted. "Excellent, Excellent. You're a an of your word. Do I have to revise this, Forestier?" Forestier answered quickly.

"There's no need at all, M Walter. I went over it with m to give him the right approach. It's quite good."

And the Director who was being asked to deal the eards by 1 important, if insignificant-looking little man, a Deputy of 1 Left Centre, added indifferently: "That's all right then." In the Interestier didn't allow him to begin the fresh game, and hispered in his ear: "You know you promised me to engage 1 uroy in Marambot's place. Do you want me to settle with 1 im on the same terms?"

"Yes, the same." And taking his friend's arm the journast led him away what time M. Walter settled himself down rain to his game.

Norbert de Varenne had not raised his head. He seemed aither to have seen nor recognized Duroy. Jacques Rival, I the other hand, had shaken hands with him, with a demonstative energy and friendly goodwill that made one sure of im in case of need.

They traversed the waiting room again and as everyone oked at them expectantly Forestier said to the youngest of the women, loudly enough to be heard by all those patiently aiting: "The Director will see you presently. He is in concrence, just now, with two members of the Budget Compission." Then he hurried off, very important and harassed to one immediately about to draft a despatch of gravest aport.

Back in the sub-editor's room Forestier at once resumed his lboquet, concentrating on it and counting his score as he spoke Duroy. "Now listen. You will come here daily at three clock. I shall tell you your duties and give you your assignents, for the day may be, or the evening or the morning. The, I shall first give you a letter of introduction to the office sperintendent at the Prefecture of Police,—two, who will put you in touch with all his subordinates. And you will it with him to get every scrap of important news three, fm the Prefecture itself and from official and demisofficial circular d'you understand? In matters of detail you will cons Saint Potin who is well up in it-four, you'll save to get us to pumping the guts out of anyone I send you to five, a to gate crash everywhere, barred gates notwithstanding and you'll touch for that two hundred frames a mon fixed plus two sous a line for everything worth while of y_{01} own—seven, plus another two sous a line for articles, you commissioned to write-eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve, the teen." He broke down at fourteen: "Good God, thirtee again. It always beats me. I shall die on the 13th for certain

One of the subs who had finished his copy took his ow bilboquet out of the cupboard, a finy little fellow of thirty five who looked like a child; other knights of the pen can in and one after the other each sought out his own toy. Som there were six of them side by side. backs to the wall bouncing with solemn regular movement their red yellow a black balls in the air. And the two sub-editors still at work got up to act as judges.

Forestier won by eleven points and the little fellow, like small boy, rang a bell and ordered "nine beers" and while they waited for their liquor they set to at the contest again

Duroy drank a glass of beer with his new colleagues and the asked his friend.

"What am I to do now?"

"I have nothing for you to day. You can clear off, if you like."

"And ...our ...our article ...will it be passed this evening." "Yes, but don't you bother about that: I'll correct the proofs Do the next one for to-morrow and come here at three o'clocks the same as to-day."

And Duroy, after shaking everyone's hand without the least idea of it's owner's name, went down the staircase light heart

CHAPTER IV

EDRGES DUROY slept badly, tremendously excited by the rospect of seeing his article in print. At dawn he was up ad about, and he was striding down the street well before he hour when the newspaper vans would deliver their wares from kiosk to kiosk.

Then he reached Saint-Lazare station well aware that the ie Française would be on sale there before it reached his own eighbourhood.

He saw the newsagent arrive, saw him open his glass shop and then a man with a huge pile of papers on his head. He urled himself at him. There were the Figaro, Gil-Blas, the taulois, the Evénement and two or three other morning papers; at of la Vie Française not a single one.

Fear gripped him. ''They might have put off' Reminicences of a Chasseur d'Afrique' till to-morrow or Daddy Valter might even have turned it down altogether at the last noment."

Going over to the kiosk again he saw the paper was on sale low. He darted forward, snatched one up, threw down three ous and ran through the titles on the first page. Not a word. Its heart beat like a hammer. He turned the sheet; with a remendous thrill he read at the foot of a column in big print:

Georges Duroy". It was in! What a moment!

He strode out, hat on one side, the paper in his hand. He vanted to accost everyone, to proclaim aloud, "Buy it—buy it. In article by me is in it." He would have liked to shout at he top of his voice like the evening news boys "Vie Française, Vie Française. Article by Georges Duroy. Vie Française. Reminiscences of a Chasseur d'Afrique." And suddenly he vanted to read the article himself, to read it in public, in a afé, in full view of everyone. He wanted one where he was well known, and after a longish walk installed himself in a sort of wine shop. Several customers were already inside and regardless of the early hour he called for a rum, the "Waiter give me the Vic Française."

A white aproved waiter came running.

"We haven't got it Monsieur. We take only the Rappel, Siècle, the Lanterne and the Petit Parisien."

Furiously indignant Duroy shouted: "Then get one, ble head. Go and buy me one." The waiter ran out and brou it, and Duroy started to read his article, several times deels ing loudly: "Excellent, very good, splendid" to attract neighbours' attention and make them curious to know w was this remarkable contribution. At length he got ur The landlord saw him and called him back. "Yo forgetting your paper sir." Duroy replied: "I'm leaving I've read it. There's a first rate article in it to-day," and y much satisfaction saw one of the customers pick it up f the table.

He thought: "What to do now?" and decided to go to office, draw his month's pay and sack himself. He felt a th of pleasure as he thought of the impression he would m on his chief and his colleagues, especially his chief's bewild ment. He walked slowly so as not to arrive before nine-thi as the cashier's office didn't open till ten.

His office was a large, gloomy forbidding place, gaslit in winter throughout the day. There were eight clerks in it a a managing clerk hidden behind a partition.

Duroy first claimed his hundred and eight francs twen five centimes in its yellow envelope deposited in the pay eler Then with conquering air he sallied into the v work room where he had passed so many hours. As he ent ed the head clerk summoned him: "Ah! so it's you M Dur The chief's been asking for you several times. You know doesn't allow two days' sick leave without a medical certificat

Duroy, holding himself bolt upright for his great effect, plied in stentorian tones:

"I'm a bit fed up with the little squirt."

A movement of complete stupefaction and the frighten head of M Potel appeared peering over the partition whi shut him up like a box.

He was rheumatic and barricaded himself in there for feadraughts, having pierced three little peopholes throughich he surveyed his staff.

One could have heard a pin drop. Then the dumbfounder ead clerk demanded feebly: "What did you say?"

"I said I was a bit fed up with the little squirt. I've only ried up to-day to tell him I'm sacking myself. I've got the both of sub-editor on the Vie Française at five hundred a montage commission. I've started this morning."

He had promised himself to prolong his pleasure but hadn' gen able to resist blurting it out at one blow.

The effect was magical. There was not a movement from pul. Then Duroy declared: "I'll just tackle Perthuis, the ll come and say good-bye." And he marched into the chie ho, on seeing him, said sharply: "Ah! there you are. Yo now I don't allow...." The employee pulled him up short "Stop bellowing like that."

M. Perthuis, a fat man and red as a turkey cock, sat suffe ated with amazement.

Duroy went on: "I've had about enough of your shop. I've tarted this morning in the journalistic line and in a very fin ost. Good-bye."

And he walked out. He was avenged.

He shook hands with his former colleagues. They had hear he conversation with the chief through the half open door an ardly dared speak to him for fear of compromising them elves.

In the street again, with his pay in his pocket, he stood him elf a tasty lunch at a good restaurant he knew with moderat ariff; then after buying another Vie Française and leaving behind on the writing table, he went into several shops buyin ittle odds and ends, anything to make them send at home for im, to be able to give his name—"Georges Duroy" and add I am the sub-editor of the Vie Française."

He still had plenty of time and entered a printer's shop The printer was turning out visiting cards on the spot under the eyes of passers-by; and Duroy immediately ordered a hur fred with his new status under his name:

Then he made for the office.

Forestier greeted him condescendingly as one does an in "Ah! there you are, —good. I've several jobs to you. Wait ten minutes for me. I must finish this, " and h went on with a letter he was writing.

At the other end of the large table, a pale bloated little $m_{\tilde{q}\eta}$ very fat with a shining bald head was writing, his nose near touching the paper through extreme shortsightedness.

Forestier looked up: "Now then Saint-Potin, what time are you going to interview our people?"

"At four."

"Well, take young Duroy here with you and show him the ropes."

"Very good."

Then, turning towards his friend, Forestier added:

"Have you brought the second part on Algeria? The first one was quite a success this morning."

Duroy faltered out: "No....I really haven't had time this morning....I've had such a lot of things to do....I couldn't manage it" The other lifted his shoulders, with a dissatisfied air. "If you are not more up to the mark than that you'll spoil your future, you know. Daddy Walter was count. ing on your copy. I was going to tell him it would be reade for to-morrow. If you think you'll be paid for doing nothing you're making a mistake."

Then, after a pause, he added: "You must strike while the iron's hot, damn it."

Saint-Potin rose: "I'm ready," said he.

Forestier pivoted round on his chair, assumed an almost pontifical manner to give his instructions and turning to Duroy, said: "Listen. For the last two days we've had in Paris the Chinese General Li-Theng-Fo, staying the Continental, and the Maharajah Tippoo the Bristol. You're going to interview them. at Ask General and the Maharajah for their views intrigues of England in the Far East and India and on her domination; get their hopes on European and especially French intervention in their troubles."

He subsided, then added like an actor to the wings: t will be of great interest for our readers to know at the actime what they think in China and India about those estions which so strongly agitate public opinion here at this peture."

Then for Duroy's benefit: "Study Saint-Potin's methods.'s a first rate reporter. Get to learn from him how to pty a man inside five minutes." He started to write in, aloof, with the clear intention of putting his old comle and new colleague in his place and emphasizing the tance between them.

Outside the door Saint-Potin chuckled and said to Duroy: here, you have a go-getter. He even puts over his act on us.

e would think he took us for his readers."

n the Boulevard the reporter suggested a drink, and Duroy reing, they went into the cafe and ordered two, iced. Sainttin became expansive. He talked of everything and of paper with a wealth of surprising detail. "The boss? typical Jew. And the Jews, you know, never change, at a race!" And he cited astonishing traits of avarice, that avarice peculiar to the children of Israel, two-penny nomics, cookshop bargainings, shameful discounts claimed 1 obtained, all the tricks of the moneylender and the wabroker.

'And with it all mind you, our little Jew-boy believes in hing and sails with the wind. His paper is Tory and eral, Catholic and secular, republican and royalist,—everying. It was founded to support his operations on the 'change I his thousand and one financial enterprises. On these it is leed consistent, and he makes millions by companies which ren't four sous capital."

Then he held forth on Mme Walter and fine feathers making ine bird, of Norbert de Varenne an old has-been, of Rival eincarnation of D'Artagnan. He came to Forestier.

'As for him he simply had the luck to marry his wife and t's that." Duroy asked: "What do you make of his wife?" saint-Potin flourished his hands: "Oh! a rake—an upper ss courtesan. She's the mistress of Vaudree, the Count de Vaudree, who dowried her and married her off."

Duroy felt a sharp cold sensation, a kind of nerve shrivelling, a desire to hurt and slap this prattler's face. he interrupted him only to ask simply: " Is your name real

The other replied candidly: "No. My name is Thom It's the paper that's christened me Saint-Potin."

And Duroy, after paying his compliments, said "But getting on and we've two noble potentates to call on."

Saint-Potin roared with laughter: "Good Lord what a ch you are! Do you think I'm going to ask this Chinese and Indian what they think of England? Don't I know bett than they do what they've got to think for the readers of Vie Française? Haven't I already interviewed five hunds Chinese, Persians, Hindus, Chileans, Japanese and other They all give exactly the same views-my views. I've on to fish out my last article on the previous latest arrival their face, their name, their titles, their age and their retime One must be accurate about that, otherwise I'll have Figaro or the Gaulois pulling me up. But on that subject in concierge at the Bristol and the Continental will put me we in five minutes. We'll smoke a cigar and walk it.

"That means a hundred sous cab hire charged to the pape There you are, my dear fellow, that's how the old hand do

"It must pay well to be a reporter in conditions....! that."

The journalist answered with some mystic words: "Yes, does; but nothing pays so well as the 'echoes,' the disguise advertisements.'' They rose and strolled along the boulevan towards la Madeleine. And Saint-Potin suddenly remarked

"You know, if you've anything else on hand, I don't need you really." Duroy shook hands and departed.

The article he had to turn out in the evening fidgeted him and he started thinking it out. Walking along he stored w reflections, ideas, opinions and anecdotes as he climbed to Champs-Elysées, where there was hardly a pedestrian to seen. Paris had been emptied by the heat.

fter dining at a wine shop near the Arc de Triomphe he lled slowly home on foot and sat down at his desk to work. ut the instant his eyes fell on the wide sheet of blank paper, the material that he had collected vanished from his mind, f his brains had evaporated. He tried to reassemble the es of reminiscences and fix them; as he caught up with n. they escaped him or rather they hurled themselves at him -mell and he didn't know how to show them, to dress them nor which one to begin with.

fter an hour's efforts and five pages of paper blackened by oductory phrases with nothing to follow them he told self: "I haven't got into the way of it yet. I shall have ake another lesson." And all at once the prospect of ther mornings's work with Mme Forestier, the hope of ther long tête-à-tête, intimate, friendly, inviting, filled him I lust. He went to bed at once, almost afraid of trying to e again and succeeding at the first attempt.

e rose, only a little late in the morning, putting off and thing in advance the delight of the visit.

was past ten when he rang his friend's bell.

e was kept waiting five minutes and then ushered into the y where he had passed such a delightful morning. Foreswas now in the chair he had occupied and was writing in Iressing gown and slippered feet, while his wife in the same e peignoir, was dictating, her elbow on the mantelpiece a eigarette in her mouth.

uroy stopped on the threshold and murmured: "I'm so y, I'm interrupting you."

nd his friend turning his head, an angry head, grumbled: hat d'you want now? hurry up. We're busy."

he other broke in flustered: "It's nothing, thanks. I'm y."

prestier became more exasperated: "Good God! Don't e time. You haven't pushed your way in for the pleasure saying good-morning, have you?" Duroy thoroughly arrassed now, tried to pull himself together; "No....you see.... I haven't begun my article yet and youyou both were....so....so....kind last time....I was hoping....I ventured to hope...."

Forester cut him short:

"You're at the top of the world, my world. So you think am going to do your job for you and all you have to do is call on the cashier at the end of the month. Not too ba I must say."

The young woman went on smoking, not saying a wow smiling that vague inscrutable smile, like a pleasant mask conceal reflections full of sarcastic irony.

Reddening with humiliation Duroy stammered: "Forging me....I thought....I had believed...." Then himself up. He spoke clearly, vigorously roughy "I most sincerely apologise, Madame, and once more let m thank you very gratefully for the charming instalment yo did for me yesterday." He told Charles curtly that he would be at the office at three and left. "I'll do the job myself. he muttered striding home at a tremendous pace. "I'll sho them."

Seething with anger he started to write the moment he go home. He carried off with the adventure begun by Min Forestier piling in fictitious details, astonishing escapade and flowery descriptions; a combination of the clumsy pedan try of the collegian and the slang of the barrack room. hour he had put together a confused rambling medie of silly follies and bore it off with the utmost dence to Le Vie Française.

The first person he ran into was Saint-Potin who shook hi hand with the familiarity of an accomplice: "You've rear my interviews with the Chinese and the Mahrajah. Pretty good, isn't it? It's amused all Paris. And I never set ever on either of them."

Duroy who hadn't read a word of it, glanced over a long article headed India and China while the reporter indicated and underlined the most salient parts of it.

Forestier came in, puffing, hurried, business-like.

"Ah! Good, I want you two."

And he gave them a number of political assignments for the evening.

buroy gave him his article.

Here's the second part of 'Algeria'."

Right, I'll give it to the chief."

hat was all.

aint-Potin drew his new colleague aside into the ridor.

Have you visited the cash section?"

No. Why? "

Why! To draw some pay. You see, one should always wa month in advance. One never knows what's going to pen."

But....I never stipulated for it."

"I'll introduce you to the eashier. He won't make any able. They pay well, here."

and Duroy drew two hundred frames, plus twenty-eight nes for his first article which with what was left of his pay m the railway, put him three hundred frames in pocket, had never had so much money and felt himself a rich n.

Then Saint-Potin took him round four or five rival offices a chat in each, hoping that the copy which he had been missioned to collect had already been secured by the others I relying on his gift of skilled and guileless pumping to it out of them.

In the evening, Duroy with time on his hands decided on other visit to the Folies-Bergère, and telling himself that dacity paid, presented himself at the box-office.

"My name is Georges Duroy, sub-editor of the Vie unçaise. I came the other day with M Forestier who omised to arrange about my pass. I don't know if he's ne it yet?"

They looked up a register. His name was not there. Hower, the head clerk, a very affable fellow, let him in and ld him to put in his application to the manager who would are him a pass at once.

He went in and almost immediately ran into Rachael, the oman he had gone with the first evening.

She came up to him. "Hallo dearie. How are you?"

"Very well, and you?"

"Not too bad. You won't believe it, but I've dreamed you twice since the other day."

Duroy smiled, flattered. "Really? And what does prove?"

"It proves that I like you, you rascal, and that we'll d again if you say the word."

"To-day if you like."

"Right, but listen " he hesitated, doubtful how to it...." this time I've no money; I've just left a cro where I've thrown away the lot."

She looked at him closely, detecting the lie in a second the skilled instinct of a girl well used to the tricks hagglings of men. She said: "Liar! That sort of the doesn't go down with me you know. It's not playing far

He gave an embarrassed smile : "You can have ten fran

It's all I've got left."

She veered round with the indifference of a prostit indulging her own whim:

''All right, anything to please you, dearie. I only we you."

And, raising a seductive pair of eyes to his, she took young man's arm, pressing herself against him amorous "We'll have a grenadine first; and then we'll have a lo round. I'd like to go to the opera with you, to show you there. Afterwards we'll go home early, won't we?"

He slept late with the girl. It was day when he left a his first thought was to buy the Vic Française. He opened with feverish haste. His article was not in it; and he half on the pavement, running his eye over the printed colum again in the hope that he would still find it there.

Immediately he was plunged in gloom; after the fatigue a night of love the disappointment fell on him with the weig of a disaster.

He went home and went to sleep, fully dressed.

Some hours later he sought out M Walter in the editor sanctum.

'I was very surprised this morning, sir, not to find my ond Algerian article in the paper."

The director looked up and said coldly: "I gave it to your end Forestier and asked him to read it. He didn't think good enough; you'll have to do it again."

Duroy was furious. He went out without a word and sily marched into his old comrade's room.

'What d'you mean by stopping my article this morning?" The journalist, buried in his arm chair, was smoking a arette, his feet on the table, rumpling with his heels an icle just begun. He spoke with easy composure in a bored of tone. "The chief considered it bad work and told me give it back to you to begin it all over again. And wait, re it is." And he languidly indicated the sheets with his ger, lying under a paper-weight.

Duroy was stupefied. He couldn't find a word to say, and he put his copy in his pocket Forestier went on: "To-day ar first job is with the Police Commissioner...." and ailed a list of assignments. Duroy left unable to find the ing, sarcastic, witty retort he sought for.

He brought his article back the next day. It was returned him again. Having refurbished it a third time and seeing again turned down he realized that he was running before could walk and that Forestier alone could help him along it particular road.

He referred no more to the 'Reminiscences of a Chasseur Afrique,' making up his mind to be as wily and resourceful he could, and, while waiting all the time for something better, show himself keen on his job as a reporter. He got to know wings of theatres, the haunts of politicians, the corridors I vestibules of statesmen and the Chamber, the Deputies, the der-Secretaries, the scowling faces of surly understrappers I how to wheedle and get round them all.

He obtained permanent contacts with ministers, concierges, nerals, police agents, princes, pimps, prostitues, ambaslors, bishops, perverts, crooks, jail birds, business magnates, omen, waiters and innumerable others; he became the genial erant acquaintance of the whole collection, blending them all together in his mind, weighing them all in the same seal sizing them up with the same eye, the result of seeing the every day and every hour and talking to them all in the way his business. He likened himself to one who has to taste of after the other every brand of wine and can no longer disti guish between Chateau-Margaux and wine-shop trash.

In a very short while he became a remarkable reporter, su of his information, astute, quick, subtle, really valuable to the paper, as Daddy Walter himself admitted, and he knew a g_{00} journalist.

All the same as he drew only ten centimes a line plus his to hundred francs fixed salary and as the life of the boulevard, i café and the restaurant was expensive, he was always broke a miserable.

"It's a dodge I've got to find out," saw certain of colleagues his money, without having the clue as least. by which they procured this he speculated enviously on anonymous and dubious operation on secret services rendered, on illicit gain tendered as accepted. Well, he would solve this mystery, join this sile partnership, force himself on its members and they would have to admit him into it.

And often, in the evening; looking out of his window at the passing trains, he pondered on the means he would employ.

CHAPTER V

rapid fortune seemed a long time coming. What galled a was the hundrum dead level of mediocrity of his life and complete inability to see his way towards scaling the heights I exacting deference and money. He felt himself shut in by dull routine of a reporter, enclosed by walls from which re was no exit. His work was appreciated but no one orded him his real status. Forestier even, to whom he was the greatest value, never now-a-days asked him to dinner and ated him as a complete inferior, though he still kept up the nee and thou" of friends.

Occasionally, it was true, Duroy would manage to place some ling article, having acquired by experience a superficial metence and style which had been lacking when he had tten his second Algerian article. But as for turning out thing spontaneous or original of his own or treating political jects authoritatively and judicially, there was all the differe between driving along the avenues of the Bois as coacha and as master. What humiliated him more than anything to have the doors of society closed to him, not to be on al terms with anyone of culture, to lack the friendship of nen of any standing, except a fairly well known actress or who entertained him occasionally from motives of selferest. Besides, he knew and had proved that he possessed women of all kinds a peculiar fascination, an instant appeal he fretted all the more on this account, at not knowing wowho could influence his future, with all the impatience of obbled horse.

lany a time he had thought of paying a call on Mme estier but the humiliation of their last meeting stopped him well as the probability that she would be engaged, with her band. Then he remembered Mme de Marelle and her tation to visit her, so, having nothing to do one afternoon he presented himself at her house. He rang her bell at fifteen. She lived in de Verneuil avenue. At the sound a bell a nurse-maid opened the door, a slovenly little woman untidy hair, tying her cap on as she spoke, Yes, Madanze, in, but she didn't know whether she was up yet.

Duroy went in. The room was fair sized, with a negl look about it and scantily furnished. Six shabby old were ranged along the walls, a servant's alignment, for was nothing here of the fastidious care of a woman who a pride in her home. Four tawdry pictures portraying a on a river, a ship at sea, a sheep in a field and a wood-cutter a forest, hung, all four of them crookedly from unequal eco Obviously they had hung there slanting for a long time a careless indifferent eye.

Duroy sat down and waited. He waited a long time. a door opened and Mme de Marelle came in, running. on a Japanese rose silk dressing gown embellished with go landscapes, blue flowers and white birds:

"You won't believe it, I was still in bed. How nice of to come and see me. I quite thought you'd forgotten me.

She held out both hands with a delighted gesture, and D whom the shabby room had put at his ease, kissed one as he seen Norbert de Varenne do.

She sat him down and surveyed him from head to foot.

"How you've changed! You've got poise now. Paris done you good. Now, tell me all the news." And he chatters away at once with the curious feeling that an intimate friend ship had been born in a moment, that one of those currents. trust, familiarity and affection had been formed which sometime bring about immediate understanding between two people the same character and race.

Suddenly the young woman broke in with an interruption that astonished him. "I've a strange feeling with you. I see to have known you ten years. I think we'are going to be grad chums. Would you like to be?"

He replied, "certainly,"—with a smile which implied he would like a good deal more.

He found her very tempting in her bright soft dressing wn, less refined than the other in her white peignoir, less fasti-ous, not so dainty but spicier, more exciting.

Nearness to Mme Forestier with her gracious enigmatic rile which beckoned him on and halted him at the same time, hich seemed to say "you please me" and "take care" made m want to lie at her feet, to kiss the thin lace so delicately vering her breast, to inhale slowly the lovely warm perfume her. With Mme de Marelle the desire was more brutal, ore animal, more distinct, making his hands tremble before e curves of her body revealed by the thin silk.

She chattered away, every sentence sparkling with that rightly quick wit of which she was mistress. He listened inking: "She's worth keeping in with. One could make a rrisian diary out of it, a gossip feature on the day's events." There was a soft knock at the door by which she had come in d the little girl appeared. She walked straight across to troy and held out her hand to him.

The astonished mother murmured: "It's an absolute conest. I never would have believed it." The young man kissed e child and sat her beside him, pleasantly but with the utmost avity questioning her about what she had been doing since by had last met. She answered in her tiny flute-like voice th solemn grown-up seriousness.

The clock struck three. The journalist rose to leave.

"Come often," Mme de Marelle invited, "we can have ier talks. I shall always enjoy your coming. But why ven't I seen you at the Forestiers?"

"Oh! no reason really. I've had so much to do. I hope we all meet again there one of these days."

And he left, his heart full of hope without knowing why. didn't mention this visit to Forestier.

But he kept the memory of it in the days following; more in the memory, a kind of sensation of the inreal yet persistent esence of this woman. It was as if he had taken away some rt of her, her bodily image remained before his eyes and her critual being in his heart. He lived under the thrall of it, we do sometimes after passing hours of delight with another. · was, so to say, possessed in a way which was strange, int mate, confused, disturbing and yet exquisite because it was still of mystery.

In a few days he paid a second call.

The nurse-maid ushered him in and Laurine appeared a once. This time she didn't offer her hand but her fac and said: "Mamma told me to ask you to wait. She will be a quarter of an hour. In the meantime I shall try tentertain you."

Duroy, much amused by the ceremonial manners of the child, replied with mock gravity: "Excellent, mademoisely I shall be most happy to pass a quarter of an hour with you But I warn you I am not in a serious mood. It is my habit to play games every day. I propose now to play the game of 'chase the cat'."

The little oddity hesitated, puzzled, then she smiled with the condescension of a grown up woman, a little shocked and surprised also; she murmured: "The rooms are not made to play in."

He answered: "Very likely: but I play everywhere. Not catch me." And he ran round the table, inciting her to ehas him, while she followed behind, smiling all the time with a kind of polite tolerance, now and again holding her hand out to touch him but never lowering herself to the extent of running.

He stopped, bent down, when she came on with her little faltering steps, he leaped in the air like a jack-in-the-hox and launched himself with one bound to the other end of the room. This amused her, she broke into a laugh, became excited and began to trot along behind him, uttering pretty, happy half fearful little cries when she thought she had caught him. He moved the chairs about, placed obstacles, made her run round one of them after him and then leaving that, jumped behind another. Laurine, a rosy maid now, and running with might and main was a picture of happiness, throwing herself into this new game with all the glow of a delighted child enchanted with everyone of her companion's flights, leaps and tricks. Suddenly just as she thought she had caught him he took her in his arms and lifting her nearly to the iling said. "Cat perched."

The child wriggling her little limbs to escape, laughed vously.

Mme de Marelle entered. She was completely amazd: Laurine....Laurine, you, playing !....You really are a ·cerer, monsieur."

He put her down, kissed her mother's hand and they sat : between them. They wanted to talk; but Laurine, so te as a rule, was thoroughly wound up now and babbled ay without stopping. In the end they had to send her m the room.

She obeyed without demur but with tears in her eyes. As soon as they were alone Mme de Marelle lowered her Dyou know I've been thinking of you and I've got a idea. This is it. As I dine every week at the estiers', I return it occasionally in a restaurant. You I don't entertain at all at home. I've no arrangements it and besides I've nothing in the house, no kitchen, not hing. I like to live like a Bohemian. So I dine them n time to time in a restaurant, but it's not too cheerful, three of us, and my acquaintances hardly know them. telling you this to explain an invitation which is a bit gular; I want you to join us next Sunday at the café re at half past seven. You know the place?"

e accepted eagerly. She went out: "We shall be just the · of us; a little party on our own. These little outings quite an event for women like me who are not used to ie was wearing a dark maroon dress which moulded her re, her thighs, her throat and arms in a way which was ngly provocative; and Duroy felt a perplexed astonisht, a constraint almost at the obvious contrast between ordered graceful elegance and the careless indifference re lodgement which housed it.

1."

rerything which clothed her body, everything which hed her flesh intimately and directly, was delicately dious but what surrounded her mattered nothing at all.

He left her feeling, just as he had before, a sort of mental hallucination, that strange feeling of her continued present He looked forward to the day of the dinner with ever-growing impatience.

He still couldn't afford to buy a dress suit and had hire one again. He was the first to arrive at the restaurant some minutes before time.

He was shown to the second storey to a little red deep rated dining room with its one window looking out on the boulevard.

On a square table with four covers was spread a while table cloth so shining that it might have been polished and the glasses, silver and cutlery glittered gaily under the flames of a dozen candles in two high candelabra. Outside was subdued green from the trees softly illuminated by the lights from the private rooms.

Forestier came in and shook hands with a cordial friend ness that he never displayed in the Vic Française Office.

"The two ladies will arrive together," he said. very nice, these little dinners." Then he looked at table, extinguished one of the gas jets, shut one side of the window on account of the draught and carefully chose the most sheltered place for himself declaring: "I've got to i very careful. I've been better for a month but for the past day or two I've not been too fit. I must have caught col Tuesday coming out of the theatre."

The door opened and the two young women appeared followed by the manager. They were veiled, remote, dis creet with that charming mysterious allure they assume in these places of suspect neighbours and meetings.

As Duroy greeted Mme Forestier she complained of his not having been to see her; then with a smile towards her friend she added: "The fact is you prefer Mme de Marelle you find plenty of time for her.'

They sat down and the manager handed Forestier the wine lists. Mme de Marelle cried: "Give the gentlement whatever they like. We will have the best iced champagnea sweet champagne of course-nothing else." And when the in had left she said with an excited laugh: "I'm going to read myself out to-night. We're going to have fun this ening and make a real night of it."

Forestier who appeared not to have heard said: "Does yone mind if I close the window? My chest has been thering me for some days."

No one minded and he went and closed the remaining half the window, returning to his seat more cheerful and ightened up.

His wife said nothing. She seemed thoughtful, Her eyes re lowered towards the table; while she smiled at the asses, that vague graceful smile which was always making promise that she would never fulfil. Ostend oysters were ought, delicate, fleshy like little ears shut in their shells, sting between the palate and the tongue like salted sweetats. Then, after the soup, a trout, pink as a young girl's sh, and the guests began to chat.

First they discussed a scandal which was going its rounds, was the story of a lady of rank surprised in a private on with a foreign prince by a friend of her husband.

Forestier was much amused by this adventure and laughed Both the women proclaimed that idly. the bbler was a blackguard and a coward. Duroy took their ew and hotly asserted that in affairs of this kind a man d a duty to support, one simple imperative duty, and that is to preserve the silence of the grave. He added "How Il life would be of delightful incidents if each one of us uld count on the absolute discretion of the other. ten stops women, nearly always stops them in fact, is the ar of trust betrayed, the secret being given away. Come w," he said smiling, "own up, isn't this true? Aren't ere many who would surrender to sudden passion, to the tick violent impulse of an hour, to a whim, a caprice of sire, if they weren't so terrified of paying for a short while light-hearted bliss by some irreparable scandal and bitter

He spoke with a conviction that was contagious, like one eading a cause, his own cause, like one saying: "I'm not that sort. No risk of such dangers from me. Try me an see."

Both ladies gave him a searching look, an approving look a look which said he spoke the truth, admitting, both them, by their silence that their own inflexible Parisis morals would have very quickly succumbed before the certainty of secrecy.

And Forestier stretched almost at full length on a soft one leg tucked underneath him suddenly declared with the laugh of the convinced sceptic. "Hell! Yes. We husband should have to pay for it, if our wives could be sure of silence Poor husbands what?"

They began to talk of love. Without admitting it to be eternal Duroy claimed that it should be lasting, creating bond, tender friendship, trust. The union of senses was on a seal on the union of hearts. But he waxed scornful about the jealousies, the vituperation, the melodramas, the seem which nearly always accompanied ruptures.

He felt silent and Mme de Marelle sighed: "Yes it's thone solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing in life and we so often ruin it has been solitary good thing and the life and our wretched unreasonableness."

Mme Forestier, toying with her knife, whispered: "Ye yes...it's good to be loved."

And she seemed to push her dream farther off to ponde on things she dared not say.

While they waited for the entrée, they sipped the champage and nibbled the crusts pulled from tiny round loaves. And the thought of love, slow encroaching, took possession them, exciting them little by little just as draught after draught of the clear wine warmed their blood and unsteaded their thoughts.

Lamb cutlets arrived, tender and light on their rich be of asparagus. "What a treat!" said Forestier, eating slowly and savouring the fresh viand and oily vegetable.

like cream.

Duroy answered: "When I love a woman, the whole worldisappears around her."

He spoke with conviction, elated at the thought of the ttification of love's fulfilment amid the material gratifiion he was now tasting. Mme Forestier murmured with air of being untouchable. "There is no blessing that can compared with that first pressure of the hand, when the says, 'Do you love me?' and the other answers, 'Yes, ove you. '' Mme de Marelle who had just emptied at a night another glass of champagne, said saucily: "For my t, I am not so platonic." And each of the men, his eye dling, chuckled approval of the jest. Forestier sprawling the couch, arms outstretched on the cushions said: "Your dour does you credit and shows that you're a practical nan. But might one ask what is your husband's opinion?" he shrugged her shoulders lightly, with measureless scorn, a said frankly: "M de Marelle has no opinion. He has 7....only abstentions." And the conversation descended n lofty theories on love to the realms of bawdy stories. ; was not the moment for the skilful hint, masks lifted skirts, by a subtle word, the moment for tricks of sugion, daring insolence open or disguised, impudent avowals, covered phrase which strips naked, subtly revealing what dare not say and allows to men practised in it, a sort ubtle mysterious gratification, a kind of impure contact hought by bringing into the open things secret, shameful, ful, Lidden.

iey were eating now without tasting anything, mehally concerned solely with what they said, plunged into a of desire. Both women contributed their share to all Mme de Marelle with a natural provocative assurance. Forestier with a charming reserve, a touch of shyness, or touc, her voice and her smile and with it all an allure has while seeming to diminish really emphasized the executage and active of her words.

restier lying back on his cushions, laughed, drank and li the time every now and again throwing in a remark road or so utterly crude that the ladies a little taken a by the form and only for form's sake put on an exion of reproof lasting a second or two.

ter perpetrating some particularly outrageous vulgarism he would add: "It's all right, children. If you go on you're going, you'll end up by saying exactly the same sort; thing."

Dessert came, and coffee; then liqueurs, inflaming the minds with heavy close heat.

Fulfilling her earlier announcement Mme de Marelle by me had thrown off all restraint and she acknowledged it with the merry sparkling gaiety of a woman exaggerating to anular guests' intoxication which was real and obvious enough.

Mme Forestier fell silent, prudently perhaps; and Dun feeling the effects of the wine and that he might make a for of himself, kept himself well in hand.

They were lighting their eigarettes when Forestier sudden began coughing.

It was a terrible attack, which tore his throat, as wiface purple and covered with sweat he choked into his han kerchief.

When it was over he grumbled bitterly: "They're no go to me, these parties. It's madness," All his good humb had vanished in the haunting terror of his malady.

"Come out, let's get home," he said.

Mme de Marelle rang the bell, asked for the bill. It we brought almost at once. She tried to read it but the figure danced before her eyes and she passed it to Duroy. Ye pay it for me. I'm too tight to see," and she gave him be purse.

The bill came to a hundred and thirty francs. Dur checked it, paid with two notes, took the change and pered to her: "How much shall I tip the waiter?"

"What you like. I don't know."

He put five francs in the plate, handed the young wome her change and said to her: "May I see you home?"

"You'll have to. I shouldn't be able to find my of address."

He shook hands with the Forestiers and found himself all with her in a cab. He felt her against him, her near me shut in with him in that black box lighted momentarily by ns of the street lamps. He felt the heat of her body nst him, and he could find nothing to say, absolutely noth-his mind gripped in overwhelming desire to take her in arms.

If I risked it, what would she do?" he thought; and the llection of all the hints and innuendoes during dinner oldened him while the fear of scandal held him back.

re gave him no clue, silent, motionless, sunk back in her ter. He would have thought her asleep, had he not seen eyes shiring every time a beam of light entered the tage.

What was she thinking?" He knew that he must not k, that a single word, breaking the spell, would ruin his ices; but audacity failed him, the audacity of quick al action.

e felt his foot touched. She had made a movement, k, nervous, one of appeal, perhaps. The gesture, scarcely eptible, made him tremble from head to foot. He turned ply, seized her in his arms, sought her mouth with his lips, bare flesh with his hands.

he uttered a cry, a plaintive little protest, trying to stand to push him away, to repulse him, then surrendered as if no longer had the strength to resist.

ut the carriage was pulling up at her door now, and Duroy no need to seek for compassioned words, to thank her and sess his grateful love. She made no attempt to alight, g back exhausted, inert, passive at what she had allowed; he, with his mind on the cabman's suspicions got out first ive her his hand and help her out. She got down at length abling, not speaking a word. He knocked, and as the door need asked nervously: "When shall I see you again?"

he answered so softly that he hardly heard her: "Come to the to-morrow" and disappeared in the shadow of the ibule.

e gave the coachman a hundred sous and set off at a quick arphant pace, his heart bursting with happiness.

e had done it! A married woman! A lady! A real lady! A lady of Paris! And how easy, how unexpected it had been. Till that moment he had always thought that to subj and conquer one of these delectable creatures, infinite particles were needed, endless attempts, a skilled siege, methods gallantry, words of love, whispers, gifts. And now, at touch, at the least attack, the first little advance he made s surrendered to him wholly, so quickly that he was bewilden

"She was drunk," he told himself; "to-morrow it'll be different tale; tears, reproaches." The idea disturbed hi "It won't make any difference. Now I've got her I'll kn how to keep her." And in a confused mirage out of whi emerged his ambitions, hopes of grandeur, success, renog wealth and love he saw garlanded figures, a procession women, dainty, rich, influential, passing before him smill and disappearing one after the other on the golden horn of his dreams. His sleep too, was peopled with visions.

He felt a little awkward the next morning elimbing h staircase. How was she going to receive him? What if didn't receive him at all? If she refused him admission to house. If she talked ... ? No, she dare not say anythin without giving herself away. He was master of the situation

The little nursemaid opened the door. She looked just usual. He was relieved as if he had expected to see her figure of consternation. "Madame is well?"

"Oh! yes sir, as always," and she showed him into the drawing room. He went straight to the mantelpiece to inspe himself and the state of his hair; and he was fixing his f before the glass when he saw the young woman behind looking at him on the threshold of the room.

He pretended not to have seen her and they contemplate one another in the mirror a little while before he turn round. She hadn't moved; seemed to be waiting. She open her arms, nestled against his chest, looked up at him.

embrace.

He thought: "It's easier than I would ever have believe everything's going like clockwork." And when his lips le hers he smiled, without saying a word, trying to infuse into h look an infinity of love. He kissed her fingers, whispering "Thanks. I worship you," and she took his arm as if been her husband. They sat side by side on the couch. w was the moment for him to talk; skilled, practised, ctive talk. He knew it, but to his exasperation words ed him. He mumbled: "Then you do like me a little." e put her finger on his lips, "Be quiet."

ev sat together silent, their glances mingling, burning rs entwined. "How I want you!" he said.

e repeated: "Be quiet."

ev heard the maid moving plates in the hall behind the He got up, "I can't sit so near you; I shall lose my e door opened. "Madame is served," and he solemnly arm. They lunched facing one another, $^{\rm 2d}$ his ng together, engrossed solely in each other, wrapped in oft charm of love just beginning. They are unknowingly. elt a foot, a tiny foot touch his under the table and atly imprisoned it between both his own and held it , pressing it firmly.

e maid came and went, brought the courses and took them with an everyday composure, appearing to notice ng.

meal finished they returned to the drawing room sitting e couch side by side again.

degrees he edged close to her, trying to clasp her. She snubbed him. "Take care. Someone might come in." murmured: "When shall I be able to see you alone, to you how I love you."

pinched his ear and whispered very softly: "I'm going y you a little call at your place, one of these days."

felt himself flushing, "It is ...my place ... it's very le. ' ' smiled, "What does that matter. It's you I'm going , not the room."

pressed her to say when she would come. She appointed at the end of the following week. Immediately he to worry her to make it earlier, with halting words, shining, pressing her to him, gripping her hands, fevered d face torn by desire, that impetuous desire which sooften follows a meal $t\hat{e}te$ - \hat{a} - $t\hat{e}te$.

It amused her to see him begging so ardently and she yield a day at a time. But he kept repeating: "To-morrow...s it...to-morrow!"

In the end she gave in, "Yes, to-morrow, five o'clock." He heaved a long sigh of relief; and now they talked alm calmly, with friendly intimacy as if they had known another twenty years.

They were startled by a knock at the door, and quied moved apart. She murmured: "It may be Laurine."

The child appeared, amazed, then ran towards Duroy, claping her hands transported with delight at seeing him. Scried: "Ah! Bel-Ami." Mme de Marelle laughed.

"There! Bel-Ami! Laurine has baptized you. It's a nilittle nickname for you. I shall call you that too. Be

He had taken the little girl on his knee and had to play a the little games he had taught her.

He stayed nearly three hours before returning to the office and on the staircase by the half opened door he murmur softly again: "To-morrow. Five o'clock."

"Yes," she said smiling and disappeared.

Directly his work was over he considered how he was arrange his room to receive his mistress and how best to disguise its poverty. He got the idea of decorating the wall with Japanese trinkets and for five francs he bought quite collection of little masks, dolls and drawings, with which he covered up the worst of the disfiguring stains. He study transparent pictures on the window panes representing hour on rivers, flights of birds across red skies, multi-coloured ladies leaning over balconies and funny little black meanstrutting across snow-covered plains. His room, just big enough to sleep and sit down in, soon looked like the inside of a paper lantern. He was satisfied with it and passed the even ing pasting on the ceiling all the coloured birds he had left. Then he lay down lulled by the whistling of the trains.

The next day he came back early, bringing a box of cakes and a bottle of Madeira bought at the nearby wine shop; and out this collation on his toilet table, its dirty wood hidden a napkin and the washhand basin and water jug concealed w.

hen he waited.

he came at about five-fifteen and was charmed by his int decorative scheme. "Why your home is quite nice," said, "but what a crowd on the staircase." He took in his arms and through her veil passionately kissed hair between her forehead and her hat.

n hour and a half later he escorted her to the cab-stand in rue de Rome. When she was in the cab he whispered. uesday, the same time," and she answered: "The same and the open window and kissed his lips; then the coach-flicking his horse, she cried: "Goodbye Bel-Ami," and old cab rumbled off to the weary trot of its white horse, or three weeks Duroy received Mme de Marelle in this , every two or three days, sometimes in the morning, somes in the evening.

Thile he was waiting for her one afternoon a tremendous bub on the staircase brought him to his door. A furious e, a man's, shouted: "What the hell is the little deviling for?" to which the shrill exasperated voice of a woman vered: "It's that woman who comes to see the journalist for up. She's knocked Nieky over on the landing. That of woman doesn't bother about children on landings. They ht not to be allowed here."

uroy, dismayed, drew back, hearing a quick rustle of petats and a hasty step climbing the storey below his.

e just had time to shut the door when there was a knock, Mme de Marelle burst in, breathless, hysterical, collapsed. Did you hear!"

e pretended ignorance: "Hear what?"

How they insulted me!"

Whom do you mean, 'they''

The wretches living below."

No, I heard nothing. What have they been saying to you?"

She started sobbing violently unable to get out a word. had to take her hat off, loosen her clothes, bathe her temple she was choking; then as the hysteria calmed down a little her wrathful indignation returned. She wanted him to down at once and beat them up, massacre them, anything,

He tried to soothe her: "But you know what they are, wo ing people, clods. Remember they will go to the police, you be identified, perhaps arrested, certainly ruined. We can mix ourselves up with people like that."

She passed to another idea; "What are we going to do the I can never come here again."

He answered: "It's quite simple. I'll clear out."

She murmured: "That will take time." Then quite so denly she thought of a solution and brightened up in a second

"No, listen. I've got it. Leave it to me. To-morn morning I shall send you a 'little blue.' " Little blue.' was the name she had coined for private telegrams.

She was smiling now, enchanted with her solution. even in the abandonment of love's recklessness, nothing would induce her to reveal it to him.

She was still shaken, and going down the staircase her lim trembled so much that she had to lean on his arm with all h strength.

They met no one.

As he stayed up late he was still in bed at eleven the new morning when the telegraph messenger brought him the promised "little blue."

He opened it and read: "Be at 127 rue de Constantino at five sharp: Tell them to open the flat let to Mme Dury Your Clo."

At exactly five he entered the concierge's room of a large mansion and asked. "Is this where Mme Duroy has taken?

The man, doubtless accustomed to delicate situations when prudence is necessary, looked him over, then selecting a ke from his bunch of them: "You are M. Duroy?"

"Certainly."

The concierge opened a small two roomed flat on the ground facing his office.

we living room was hung with flowered wall paper, only y clean, with mahogany furniture covered with greenish and a shabby carpet so thin that treading on it one could the wood underneath. The bed room was so tiny that the took up three parts of it; a large bed was hung with blue curtains, also of silk, with a red silk eider-down id on it blotted with suspicious looking stains.

rroy, uneasy and put out thought: "This flat's going to me a devil of a lot of money. I shall have to arrange in. What are idiot she was to have taken it."

e door opened and Clotilde, arms outstretched, rushed to a hurricane with a tremendous clatter. She was overly, transported: "Isn't it lovely, say, isn't it sweet? No say to climb, on the ground floor, right on the street. If some in and go out by the window with not a soul to see, even the concierge. Now we will love one another here." kissed her gloomily, not daring to put the question bling on his lips. She had placed a large parcel on the in the middle of the room. She opened it and took out a bottle of lavender water, a sponge, a packet of pins, a on hook, and a little pair of curling tongs for her hair h was always becoming disarranged.

e chattered away, pulling the drawers open. "I shall to bring some undies to be able to change occasionally, going to be awfully convenient. If I get eaught in a er I can pop in here and dry myself and change. We will have our own key besides the one in the lodge in case we at our own. I've taken it for three months, in your name, urse. I couldn't give my own."

en he put his question: "Might I ask what the rent is?" e answered ingenuously: "But, my dear, it's paid."

Then I am in your debt? May I again ask how much for?" o, no, darling, It's no business of yours. This is my sh little venture, all on my own."

put on an aggrieved expression: "Certainly not. I hever allow that."

e came and put her hands on his shoulders, prettily entreating. "Now, George, dear, do let me. It will give 1 such happiness, so much joy to know that this is mine, nest, all mine. Don't be cross. There's nothing for you to difficult about. Why should there be. I want to make the present to our love myself. Say it's all right, my little Ge say you agree? ... " She begged it of him with looks, lip with her whole being. He acted his part, disgruntled, angri refusing, gradually persuaded, giving in, won over.

And when she had gone he said to himself rubbing his pala together: "Not too bad. It's really not too bad."

Some days later he received another "little blue": husband arrives this evening after eight weeks' inspection, § we shall be apart for eight days. What a bore! Thy Clo."

Duroy was much perturbed. He had never given a though to the fact that she was a married woman and here was a ma whose face he would like to have seen just once so as i recognize him.

He waited patiently for the husband's departure; but h passed two evenings at the Folies-Bergère which meant tw nights in Rachael's room. Then one morning another telegran came with four words: " Presently five o'clock.

They were both before time. She threw herself into his arms with complete abandonment, covering his face will kisses, then she suggested: "If you like, when we have loved you can take me to dinner somewhere. I'm quite free."

It was the first of the month and although his pay wa mortgaged far in advance and he owed money on all side Duroy happened to be in funds and was not sorry at spending some of it on her,

He replied. "Anywhere you like darling." So they set out at about seven and reached the outer boulevard. She leaned heavily on him and whispered: "If you only knew how happy it makes me to take your arm and to feel you pressing agains

He asked: "Shall we go to Lathuille's?"

"No, no, it's far too respectable. I want something low down, vulgar, somewhere where labourers and working girls go; I love the crowds in little country pubs! If we could have gone into the country."

s knew no place of that kind in the neighbourhood and by they entered a grog shop where they served meals in a rate dining room. She had noticed it first, seeing through window two young girls eating with two soldiers.

ree cabmen were feeding at the end of the long straight and a personage impossible to classify in any line of life stretched out on a chair, legs outspread, hands in his sers-pockets, smoking a pipe, his head turned away towards par. His coat looked like a museum of grease spots, and his pockets, puffed out like so many bellies, protruded the of a bottle, a piece of dirty bread, a parcel wrapped in spaper and a ball of string. His hair was grey black, woolly, eurly and filthy, and his cap was on the ground r his seat. Clotilde's stylish elegance made her entry a ution. The two couples stopped their chatter, the cabbies ped arguing and the oddity having removed his pipe from nouth and spat vigorously in front of him, turned his head the to glance at them.

ne de Marelle murmured: "Isn't it lovely? We shall zourselves here; another time I shall dress myself up like rkgirl," and without the least embarrassment or distaste sat down at the table, polished by the gravy of bygone ers, washed by old spilled drinks and cleaned by a flick to waiter's napkin. Duroy constrained and a little dised looked about for a hatstand to hang his tall hat on, org none, put it under his chair. They dined on a ragout, cutlets and a salad. Clotilde repeated: "This is the of thing I love. It amuses me far more than the café ais." Then she added: "If you want to give me real ure take me to a tavern ball. I know a very quaint one here. It's called la Reine Blanche."

roy was amazed and asked: "Who ever took you to such ice?" He looked at her and saw her blush, a little ided in mind too as if the abrupt question had reawakened in a delicate treasured memory.

ter one of those typical feminine hesitations, so brief that are almost imperceptible she replied: "A friend," adding after a pause, "who is dead." And she lowered her eye with perfectly natural sadness.

Duroy for the first time realized how very little he knew of the past life of this woman and he reflected on it uneasily Of course, she had had lovers before but of what kind? Of what world? A vague jealousy, a sort of hostility awakened in him towards her, hostility towards everything of which he was ignorant, for everything which had not belonged to him in he heart and in that other life. He looked at her, irritated at all the mystery and secrecy hidden in that pretty, silent little head which was dreaming even now perhaps, with regret of another man, of other men. How he would have liked to have peered into her mind, to ransack it, to know everything and understand it!

She repeated: "Will you take me to the Reine Blanche?

will round off our evening."

He thought, "Bah! what does the past matter? I'm a food to bother myself about it." Then, smiling: "Certainly darling."

When they were in the streets, she said, softly, in that too of mystery in which one makes intimate disclosures, "I didn'dare ask you this till now. But you can't think how I low these tomboy escapades, in all these places where ladies are not supposed to be. When the Carnival is on I dress up as college boy. I make a really attractive student."

When they entered the dancing saloon she kept close to him, looking with fascinated eyes at the street women and their bullies. She was terrified and happy all together, and from time to time as though to reassure herself against possible trouble she would say, gazing at a policeman stolid and motionless. "That policeman has a solid look about him." After a quarter of an hour she had had enough and he saw her home.

This was the beginning of a series of excursions to all kinds of dubious resorts; and Duroy discovered a wild gipsy strain in his mistress, a passionate love for the haunts of vagabondage

She would arrive at the usual rendezvous, in working dress with a housemaid's cap on her head. But she was a house re she would keep on her bangles, rings, bracelets and mond ear-rings, giving the explanation when he asked her move them. "Nonsense. They'll think they're all sham." The flattered herself she was completely disguised and agh, in fact, she was only hiding ostrich fashion, she made way into all sorts of drinking dens of the vilest repute. The wanted Duroy to dress up like a working man; but he

he wanted Duroy to dress up like a working man; but he inately refused, sticking to the precise correct turn-out of boulevardier, declining even to change his tall hat for a k-a-day one.

he consoled herself for his obstinacy in her own quaint way. Hey will take me for a chambermaid lucky enough to have 1 picked up by a young swell," and she found the comedy zious.

hey went into one of these pothouses and sat down in the zeladen hovel, on creaking chairs before a ricketty wooden 3. A cloud of foul smoke mixed with the smell of stale fish 1 the whole place, men in blouses drinking raw spirits were ling out indecencies, and the waiter, astounded at seeing strange couple placed a couple of cherry brandies before i.e., trembling, frightened and altogether delighted drank jiqueur in little sips, looking around her with sparkling uneyes. Each cherry as she swallowed it, gave her the feeling grave error committed, every taste of the warm spiced our brought a sense of bitter pleasure, the joy of unhealthy, ous, forbidden gratification.

last she said "Let's go now," and they left the place. made a theatrical exit, like an actress leaving the stage, ng self-consciously between the sprawling soakers who ered at her with sullen hostile eyes, and when they reached loor, she gave a sigh of relief as if she had just escaped some dire peril.

metimes she would ask Duroy shivering: "Suppose I assaulted in one of these places, what would you do?" he would arrogantly reply: "Defend you of course;" she would squeeze his arm happily with a hot strange desire, to see men fighting for her, even those bullies $i_{h s_{il}^{\prime}}$ fighting her lover.

But these outings two or three times every week began bore Duroy. He was finding it increasingly difficult to bar the half-loans it cost to pay for them.

He found it hard to carry on from day to day now: hard even than in his Great Northern days, the result of his fin months in journalism when he had spent recklessly with constant hope of earning vast sums on the morrow. Now had exhausted all his resources and every means of raising money.

The simple expedient of touching the cashier was no completely used up and he already owed the paper for months' pay as well as six hundred francs advance commi sion. He also owed a hundred frames to Forestier, the hundred to the well-to-do Jacques Rival and he was hemme in on all sides by a mass of petty debts.

Saint-Potin, resourceful wily man though he was, was un able to suggest any expedient to raise another francs; and Duroy was becoming nervy and exasperated his plight, more pressing now than in the old days, his need being greater. Sullen resentment towards everyone broode in him and rasping irritability which he could not control an which flared up without warning for any trifling Reckoning up he gloomily told himself that it cost him least a thousand france a month to live without any excessive or out of the way expenditure and not counting new clothes footwear, linen and laundry. So on December 14th he found himself with no money whatever in his pocket and without? hope in the world of raising any.

Doing without lunch seemed like old times, and he passed the afternoon in the office, working, sulky and preoccupied.

Towards four o'clock he received a 'little blue' from hi mistress: "Shall we dine together? Afterwards we'll go for replied immediately: "Impossible to dine," then He reflecting that he might as well enjoy himself with her, added "But I shall expect you at nine at our flat." And, after ling one of the office boys with the message to save the of a telegram, he pondered on how he was to secure an ning meal. At seven o'clock he was still without an idea; by then he was terribly hungry. Then he thought of a perate expedient. He waited till all his colleagues had and when he was alone, briskly sounded his bell. The ector's secretary answered it.

uroy was standing up, fumbling in his pocket. He spoke ply: "I say, Foucart, I've left my purse at home and I've to dine at the Luxemburgh. You might lend me fifty sous my cab."

be clerk took three francs from his pocket and said: "Will be enough, sir."

Oh! yes, quite enough, thanks very much."

ad, taking the three silver coins, Duroy ran down the stairand dined at one of the eating houses of his "down and days.

nine o'clock, with his feet to the fire, he awaited his ress in the little living room.

e arrived, gay, happy, rosy faced from the fresh air of street. "If you feel like it," she said, "we'll go for a l first and return here at eleven. It's lovely now for a e, answered glumly: "Why go out? It's not too bad e answered without removing her hat: "It's beautiful de, such a marvellous moon. It's the very evening to go Very likely, but I don't happen to want to go out."

had said the words angrily. She was startled and hurt. nat's the matter with you? Why do you speak to me like I only want to go for a stroll. There's nothing to annoy n that."

rose, exasperated: "It doesn't annoy me. It bores me. , now you've got it."

was one of those women whom opposition irritates and iess hardens.

answered him disdainfully with cold anger.

make such a suggestion again please. It hurts me."

She was silent. Then taking him in her arms, murma "You will never know how dear you are to me."

One of their best evenings of love fellowed.

As she was leaving she said with a smile: "In a plight yours, how nice it would be to find some money one forgotten in one's clothes. A coin slipped through the lining, or anything;" and he agreed with consider earnestness.

She insisted on going home on foot, making the full moot, excuse and going into rhapsodies over it.

It was a cold serene night at the beginning of will Pedestrians and horses went quickly stimulated by the frost. Their heels beat a tattoo on the pavements.

Leaving him she asked: "Shall we meet the day after morrow in the afternoon?"

"Yes, rather."

"At the same time?"

"At the same time."
"Goodnight, dearest." And they embaraced tenderly.

He walked home at great speed trying to evolve scheme to enable him to carry on, through the next day. It as he opened the door of his room and felt in his was coat pocket for matches, he was annoyed to feel the touch coin. He took it out and examined it. It was a low twenty francs. He thought he must be mad. He turned over again and again wondering by what miracles it couldn't have fallen from heaven into pocket. Then suddenly, he guessed and flushed with any Hadn't she joked about money slipping through coat lining and how welcome it would be in hard up days? His mistry had given him charity! What a humiliation!

He swore: "Well, I'm receiving her this afternoon as she shall have a fine quarter of an hour."

And he went to bed, seething with anger and shame.

He awoke late. He was hungry and tried to go to sing again so as not to get up till two o'clock; then he muttered? This is getting me nowhere, I've got to get hold of some ney somehow." He went out, hoping for some inspiration the street. None came but, passing every restaurant a burndesire to eat filled his dry mouth with saliva. At midday, ing thought of nothing, he abruptly made up his mind: Lell! I'll have lunch out of Clotilde's twenty francs. That 1't stop me paying her back to-morrow." He lunched in rasserie for two francs fifty. Going into the office he repaid three frames to the clerk: "Here you are Foucart, the h you lent me yesterday for my cab."

Le worked till seven. Then he want to dinner and drew ther three francs from her money. Three evening beers aight his expenses for the day to nine francs thirty centimes. 3 nt as he couldn't raise any credit or manage a loan within mity-four hours he borrowed another six francs fifty from twenty that he ought to repay her that evening, with the rall that he turned up at the rendezvous with exactly four nes twenty in his pocket.

He was in a temper, like a snarling dog, and promised himf to make short work of the matter. He would say to his stress: "You know I found that twenty francs you put in pocket. I can't pay it back to-day because my position is it the same, and I haven't had time to go into money tters. But I shall repay it, the very next time we meet." The arrived, tender, eager, tremulous, fearful. How was be ng to greet her? And she embraced him ardently to sich being called on for an immediate explanation. On his e he told himself: "There's plenty of time, all the evening, broach the subject. I'll wait for the right moment." n't find the 'right moment' and said nothing, putting off introduction of the delicate and awkward subject. The did not suggest going out and was altogether charming. Pricy parted at about midnight, making only one appointnt for the week following, the Wednesday, Mme de Marelle ing dinner engagements in the city for every other night. The next day, taking his money out to pay for his lunch, roy discovered that his coins had become five and one of Dr. was gold.

At first he thought that he had been given the twenty-france piece by mistake in change the evening before but & enlightenment came and he shrank under the humiliation this perseverance in almsgiving. How he regretted not have tackled her. If he had done that forcibly this would neg have happened.

For four days he struggled and exerted himself without av to raise five louis, and then he ate up Clotilde's second one She waited her opportunity, although this time he did wrathfully, "Don't try that joke on again. It annoys me and slipped another twenty francs into his trouser pocket next time they met.

When he found them he swore; and slipped them into waistcoat pocket ready to his hand, for apart from them, hadn't one centime.

He salved his conscience by saying: "I'll return the who lot to her in a lump. It's not a gift, only money lent...."

At last the eashier of the paper, under desperate pressure consented to let him have a hundred sous a day, advance. just enabled him to eat, but was not enough to let him restor sixty francs.

And at length, Clotilde being again in the grip of her obs sion for nocturnal excursions to all the lowest haunts in Pari he no longer put himself out at finding a 'yellow boy' in on of his pockets, in his box, his watch case, anywhere after their adventurous expeditions. Since she was determined indulge in these freakish whims which he was not in a pos tion at the moment to pay for, there was no reason why should not pay for them herself rather than give them up. If kept an account of all her monetary presents for fully repayment.

One evening she said: "D'you know I've never been to Folies-Bergère? will you take me?" He hesitated, afraid running into Rachael. Then he thought: "Hell, I'm m married after all. If she does see me she'll understand the situation and look the other way, and, anyway, we'll take box.''

There was another reason. He would be able to treat Mm de Marelle to a box at the theatre without having to pay in nich, in its way, was a sort of compensation.

e left Clotilde in the carriage while he went to get the pass, so that she would think he had paid for the box then escorted her into the theatre, smartly saluted by all attendants.

a enormous crowd filled the promenade, as they made their with considerable difficulty through the mass of men and titutes. But they found themselves in their box at last, mehed between the silent orchestra and the riff-raff in the ry.

me de Marelle hardly even glanced at the stage; she fascinated by the women prowling ceaselessly behind her. She was continually turning round to look at them.

. She was continually turning round to look at them, wanted to touch them, feel their bodies, their cheeks, their to know what these strange creatures were made of.

ddenly she exclaimed: "There's a fat brunette keeps ng at us. I really think she's going to speak to us. Have noticed her?"

told her that she was mistaken, but for some time past ad seen Rachael hovering round them, anger smouldering ar eyes and tempestuous words on her lins.

troy had brushed past her a little while before in the d, and she had murmured sofily "Good evening" with a of the eye which said: "I understand." But he had no response to her greeting, passing on coldly, haughtily with a sneer, afraid of any recognition being seen by his ess.

e girl, goaded by unconscious jealousy, turned round brushed past him again saying a little lowder: "Good ng Georges."

ain, he made no reply. By now she was obstinately mined to be recognized and greeted and returned time to the back of the box, waiting a favourable tunity.

soon as she saw Mine de Marelle looking at her, she ed Duroy on the shoulder with her finger: "Good even-flow are you?"

didn't even look round, and she want on: "Well! Well!

Have you been struck deaf since Thursday!"

He spoke not a word, trying to assume a look of content which made it impossible to lower himself even by a Ro before such insolence. She began to laugh a vicious land -and said: "So you've become dumb as well! Perha Madame has bitten of your tongue."

He made an enraged gesture and said furiously: "R dare you speak to me! Be off or I'll give you in charge

At this with eyes blazing, and choking with rage, she shrie ed: "Ah! so that's how it is eh! You miserable end! Whis one sleeps with a woman, one at least, passes the time to he It's only because you've got hold of another woman now, the you won't deign to notice me to-day. If you had made as me as one little sign when I passed against you just now I won have kept quiet. But you wanted to play the little gentleman eh? You think you can make a convenience of me, dann you Ah! It wasn't only 'Good evening' you said to me when L... She would have gone on screaming indefinitely but Mme Marelle had opened the door of the box and taken refuge the crowd, frantically looking for the exit.

Duroy plunged after her struggling to get to her. A Rachael, seeing them both in full flight bawled triumphantly "Stop her! Stop that woman! She's stolen my lover."

The crowd entered into the spirit of it with derising laughter. Two men jeered at Mme de Marelle, caugh her by the shoulders, pulled her body to them, handled her tried to kiss her. But Duroy, pushing his way through violently released her and dragged her into the street. Sh staggered into a cab outside the theatre. He leapt in beside her and to the driver's 'where to?' answered distractedly "Good God, anywhere."

The carriage rattled slowly along the street. Clotild shaking all over in violent spasms seemed to be choking suffocating; and Duroy knew neither what to do nor what t

At length, as she sobbed convulsively, he began to plead "Listen Clo, my little Clo, let me explain! It's not my fault....I used to know this woman years ago....in the old he roughly pushed his face away with the fury of the lovwoman betrayed, filled with frantic rage which made her ost speechless, and stammered out in jerky staccato stutterphrases: "Ah! wretch....despicable....what unbelievable chery Is it possible? What humiliation ... My God what disgrace . . . ' then carried away more and more as glimmerings of ideas arguments began to penetrate: "It was with my money paid her ... didn't you ... And I gave him the money he used on her....that girl....for her....what a wretch on her."

for some moments she seemed to be searching for some more ng word, then suddenly she spat violently with a gesture indescribable contempt: "Oh swine swine ne....vou paid her my money...swine.... with ne." She could find no other expletive and repeated it again: "swine...swine." Suddenly ned out of the cab and pulled the driver's sleeve: "Stop!" n opening the door she leapt into the street.

Beorges made to follow her but she screamed, "I forbid a to get out," so stridenly that a crowd began to collect ound her; and he stayed inside terrified of a public indal.

Then she produced her purse, sought out some money by a light of the lamp and put two frames fifty in the cabbie's nd, saving in loud ringing tones: "There that pays u for an hour ... it's my money ... I am paying d take that lout inside there to rue Boursault aux itignolles." A ripple of amused laughter ran through the owd; a man said: " Well done little Spitfire " and a young seal standing by the cab pushed his head through the ien door, saying "Good-night little gentleman" with ocking emphasis on the last word. The carriage rumbled off the sound of loud laughter.

CHAPTER VI

Georges Duroy had a gloomy awakening the next morning He dressed slowly and sat down by the window, think things out. He had a numbed sensation throughout his will body as though the night before he had been knocked out a cudgel.

At length the urgent need of raising money roused him he set out for the Forestiers' flat.

His friend received him in his study, his feet before fire.

"What is it that's got you up so early?"

"A very serious matter. I owe a debt of honour."

"Gambling debt?"

He hesitated, then blurted out "Yes."

"A big one?"

"Five hundred francs."

Forestier, very sceptical, rapped out suddenly:

"To whom do you owe it?" and Duroy, taken off his guard stumbled badly. "To...to...to a M de Carville."

"Ah! and where does he live?"

"Rue...Rue..."

Forestier burst out laughing, "Rue Nowhere Number nil I used to know that gentleman well, old chap. francs is any use to you, I can let you have it, but not a cen time more."

Duroy accepted the gold piece.

Then he went from door to door trying all his acquaintance and finished up towards five o'clock with eighty francs.

As he was still two hundred francs short, he kept what had got together for himself muttering: "Devil take it, I'm not going to make myself ill over that little bitch. her when I can."

For fifteen days he led a spartan life, regular, austere, full of good resolutions. Then quite suddenly desire assailed him 11. It seemed years since he had held a woman in his arms like a sailor yearning for dry land, every skirt he saw 10 him tremble.

o, one evening he turned up again at the Folies-Bergère ing to find Rachael there. He saw her at once in the vestifier the theatre was her regular beat. He approached smiling, hand outstretched. She measured him from top oe: "What d'you want?"

tried to laugh: "Come, don't bear malice."

He turned on her heels declaring: "I don't consort with the blood rush to his face and returned home alone, the blood rush to his face and returned home alone, corestier, sick, weak and always coughing, now-a-days led a troublous life at the office, seeming to go out of his y to find him tedious assignments. One day even, in a ment of nervous irritation, after a prolonged bent of cough-life growled: "My God, you are more stupid than I would be believed humanly possible." This was because Duroy failed to bring back some copy be had ordered.

nt out muttering: "I'll pay you for that one of these ys." A lightning thought crossed his mind and he added: I'll make a cuckold of you, old friend." And, as he left he bled his hands together rejoiced at his project.

He resolved to put it into execution the very next day; and id a call on Mme Forestier—a reconnoitring expedition as termed it.

He found her reading a book, reclining on the sofa.

She held out her hand, without moving, only turning her nd: "Hullo Bel-Ami," she said.

He felt as if she had suddenly boxed his ears. "Why do call me that?" he mumbled.

She returned, smiling: "I saw Mmc de Marelle a week or ro ago and she told me they have given you that name at place."

The young woman's easy smile reassured him and he wondered why he had been so concerned.

1 Untranslatable abuse.

She went on: "You spoil her; and pay a duty call on when you feel like it, on the thirty-sixth of the month, a as seldom as you can." He sat down near her and looked her with new interest. She was very charming, fair with delicate tender warm freshness, made for caresses and thought: "She's certainly far more desirable than the otl one." He had not the least doubt of success, it looked as he had only to stretch out his hand and take her, like picki a ripe plum.

He said impressively: "I've not been to see you because was better not to."

Puzzled, she asked: "What? Why?" "Why? Can't you guess?" "No. I haven't the faintest idea."

"Because I'm in love with you...Oh! a little, only a litt as yet...but I don't want it to become the real thing."

She didn't seem astonished, nor vexed or flattered; she simp continued to smile her serene indifferent smile and replie composedly: "Oh!...You can come just the same. No or is ever in love with me for long."

He was taken aback; more by her tone than by her word and he asked. "Why?",

"Because it is useless and I make that quite clear to their right away. If you had told me before what you were afrai of, I would have put you right and got you to call as ofte as you could."

Quite crestfallen he said lugubriously: "As if one coul control one's feelings automatically!"

She turned to him: "My dear friend, for me, a man in lov is simply erased from the number of the living. He becomes a idiot and not merely an idiot but dangerous. With men wh fall in love with me or pretend they do I cease to have friendly relationship whatever. I do it, first because they have me and also they are to be avoided, like one keeps out of the way of a mad dog. I put them in moral quarantine till the conplaint is cured. Don't forget that. I know very well that what you call love is merely a form of appetite, greed, bust

He to me love is a kind of ... of ... communion of souls, acthing that men like you haven't got it in you to undernd. You understand the letter ... I, the spirit. But ... k me straight in the face." the was no longer smiling. Her face was calm and cold, I she said, weighing every word: "Let this sink in, once for all; I will never be your mistress, never. Is that mite enough? There is not the faintest possibility of it. ; only that, if you persist it will bring harm to you. And 7... now that the operation is finished ... would you like oe friends, good friends, loyal chums and nothing else?" Le realized that this was a sentence from which there was appeal, before which any further overtures would be merely eulous. He took the rebuke in the right spirit and quite dealy found that the chance of such a comradeship delighted

He held out both hands.

I am yours Madame in any way that pleases you." he sensed real sincerity in his voice and gave him her ds. He kissed them, one after the other and raising his 1, said simply: "Dear God! if only I had found a woman you, with what happiness I would have married her!"

ne was touched, caressed by the phrase, as women are by pliments really coming from the heart and she gave him one hose quick grateful locks by which they make men their nen as he didn't find it easy to change the trend of their ersation, she laid a finger on his arm and said softly:

I'm going to start my job as a friend right away. My Ad you lack fact ... 'She hesitated, then asked: "May I k freely."

Yes."

Quite openly."

If course."

Well! go and see Mme Walter. She likes you and you cet her. You will find an opportunity there for your oliments, although, remember this, she is a good woman, ectly straight. Don't make any mistake about that. e's no hope of any of your...of your freebooting in that quarter. You will like her better the more you know I know that your position in the paper is only a junior of But don't worry about that. They're always very please to see all their reporters. Take my advice and go."

He smiled and said: "Thanks. You're an angel, a guard angel." Then they chatted about other things.

He stayed a long while wanting her to know that he is to be with her on the new terms, and leaving he asked:

"Then it's agreed we are friends."

" Agreed."

He leaned forward and added: "It you should ever been a widow, I have made my claim;" and he hurried out, fear he had shocked her.

This idea of a call on Mme Walter worried him, for hel never been invited to call and was anxious not to court as But the Director had always been genial to him, valued services and picked him out in preference to others for diffe assignments. There was no reason, he told himself, why should not profit by this obvious godwill and secure an ent to the house.

He made up his mind to try, and rising early morn he sallied forth to the market and bought for ten francs or some twenty choice pears. These he carefully packed to m believe they came from the country and took them to concierge's lodge. With them he left his eard on which had written.

"Georges Duroy

"With compliments begs Mmc Walter's acceptance of a fruit, received by him this morning from Normandy."

Next morning he found in his letter box, an envelope taining a card, Mme Walter's, "who thanks M Georges Du very much and is at home on Saturdays."

M Walter lived in the Boulevard Malesherbes, in a umansion which he owned but of which, with the economy his race, he let out part. A concierge, gorgeous in a unifolike a church beadle's, his fat calves swathed in white stocki in a gold buttoned coat with scarlet lapels, adorned entrance impressively, if flamboyantly.

The reception rooms were on the first storcy, hung with tapeies and closed in by curtains. Two sleepy valets were dozing benches. One of them took Duroy's overcoat, the other ieved him of his cane, opened a door, preceded the visitor some paces, and then stood aside to let him pass, proclaimhis name loudly into an empty room.

the embarrassed young man looked around him and in a ror perceived some people seated. They seemed a long way

Confused by the reflection he started off in the wrong ection, then he passed through two drawing rooms into a le boudoir pretty with gold and blue silk, where four ladies e chatting over cups of tea.

His reporter's job with its constant association with well wan persons had given Duroy a measure of self-confidence, netheless his awkward entrance and the passage through exted rooms made him nervous.

le faltered out: "Madame I have given myself the isure..." all the time trying to catch the hostess's eye. he held out her hand, saying, as he bowed over it, "It's y nice of you to come and see me," and indicated a chair, which, thinking it higher than it was, he fell with a jerk. ; was a terribly boring affair. One of the women was ling forth. She was babbling about the cold weather not g severe enough to half the typhoid epidemic or to allow ing, and all of them one after the other pronounced their licts on this advent of frost in Paris, expounding their erences for the various seasons, with all the accompanybanal trivialities customary to these occasions. A slight e made Duroy turn his head and he saw in two mirrors out lady coming in. As she appeared in the boudoir, one ie guests got up, shook hands and left and the young man's fixed on a string of black pearls, followed her dark dress ugh the other rooms.

hen the new arrival had settled down they chattered on, ping spasmodically from one subject to the other, Morocco, war in the East, England's African troubles, reciting thing from memory as if they were rehearing a pleasety comedy, the lines of which they had gone over and again.

They were discussing M Linet's chances of being elected, the Academy. The new-comer fervently hoped he would beaten by M Cabanon-Lebas, author of the fine version Don Quixote in French verse, for the stage.

"You know it will be played at the Odéon next winter" "Yes, I know. It will be the literary event of the season

I must go."

Mme Walter took her part with graceful case, never he tating, her opinions always ready in advance.

But she saw that it was getting dark and rang for lam all the time listening to the endless flow of words bablin on like a brook and thinking of her next dinner party a how she had forgotten to give the order to the printer forth invitations.

She was a trifle too plump, very good looking still, at $\infty$ dangerors age. She kept her looks by diet, precaution hygiene and skin foods. She seemed sensible, moderate and reasonable, one of those women whose minds are spread like a model garden. She never gave one a surprise or anything unexpected but there was a restful charm about She possessed common sense, shrewd discreet reliable and tranquil good will towards everybody and everything will was her substitute for brilliance, sparkling wit and devoted

She noticed that Duroy had not spoken, that no one be spoken to him and that he seemed a trifle ill at ease, and the ladies were still thrashing out the matter of the pending Academy election she asked him: "You ought to know more about this than any of us M Duroy, who is your preference

He replied promptly: "In this matter, Madame, I new examine the merits of the candidates, which are always and able, but their age and their health. I don't bother along whether one of them has made a translation in rhyme but I make inquiries about the state of their liver, their heart, their kidnes and their spinal column. For me a good heart attack, a in class diabetes and especially a promising beginning of lee motor ataxy are a hundred per cent more valuable than for volumes of partriotic verse in barbaric poetry."

There was a surprised silence and Mme Walter, smiling ed: "Why?"

Ie said: "I'll tell you. Part of my job is to get copy on at you ladies like. Now, Madame, the Academy only erests you when an Academician dies. The more he dies, happier you are. So, in order that they may die off quickly v should be elected when they are old and sick," He ed. amused at their mute astonishment: "I'm like you self and I love to read of the death of an Academician. nediately ask myself: Who will take his place? and I ce my little list. It's a game, a jolly little game played every tea table in Paris the moment one of these immortals i. I call the game: 'Death and the forty Dotards'." he ladies were a bit bewildered but they began to smile. cising to leave he concluded: "It's you ladies who elect n, and you elect them only in order to see them die off, choose them old, very old, the oldest you can get, and 't bother about anything else."

hen he left with a certain grace.

s soon as he had gone, one of the ladies declared: "He's range fellow, that young man. Who is he?"

Ime Walter answered. "One of our reporters. He's not high up yet, but I'm certain he'll rise."

buroy ran down into the street gleefully by great dancing s, pleased with his leave taking and saying to himself: n excellent exit."

hat night he made it up with Rachael.

wo notable events marked the following week. He was ointed chief of the reporting staff and received an invitate dine from Mme Walter. He at once saw the connected week the two events.

a Vie Française was above everything else a capitalist er, its proprietor being a man of capital who used the press his membership of the legislature as levers. He made ality a weapon and manoeuvred under the mark of the f honest fellow, but he employed for his various designs men that he had tried, tested and proved, whom he knew be wily, bold and resourceful. Duroy, newly appointed chief reporter, seemed to him the very man he was looking at This post had been filled till quite recently by the editor secretary, an old journalist, a M Boisrenard; he was compute the value of the secretary to a degree. For thirty years had been editorial secretary to eleven different journ without changing or modifying a single habit. He pass from one editorial sanctum to another, like changing a rest rant, hardly noticing that the food had not quite the safeste. Political and religious views, officially he had not the did his work like a blind man who sees nothing, a deman hearing nothing and a dumb man saying nothing. In he had, nonetheless, an unassailable professional loyalty a would not lend himself to a thing which he did not consider honourable, loyal and correct from a professional point view.

M Walter who valued him greatly wanted to entrust | Echoes—an uninterpretable word partially explained 'spreading of rumours' but meaning much more-to another man. It was the holder of this and those under him w launched out the news, who started those rumours on the rounds which influenced the publicand big money. At soci society affairs he it was who must introduce, without seem to, the vital subject, rather insinuating it than saying it of right. It was his job by subtle suggestion to make people think what he wanted them to, to deny by innuendo whi rumour was affirming or to affirm what no one, up to the believed to be true. Everyone of these men had to find ever day at least one item of interest to the reading public. I must think of everything for everybody. He must do the thinking for all the professions, for Paris, for the Province the Army, the Artists, the Clergy, the University, the Judician the Prostitutes.

The man who rules and commands a battalion of reports for a great newspaper must be always awake, on his guar all the time, suspicious, looking ahead, sharp, resourceful watchful, up to every artifice, with an infallible instinct a detect bogus news at a glance, to judge what can be published and what suppressed, to feel the pulse of the public, and st know how to deck out his stories so that their effect is tiplied. M Boisrenard, with all his long experience, had the gift of leadership; and above all he lacked that native ning, essential every day for the proprietor's secretogaganda.

urroy on the other hand fitted in to a job like this perly and was the ideal chief reporter for this journal, the deal of Norbert de Varenne's sailed in the sea of State and down the creeks and cross-ecldies Polities."

he inspirers and real reporters of la Vie Française were a dozen members of Parliament, themselves financially rested in the speculations which the Director launched and ained. They were known in the Chamber as "Walter's g' and were much envied there because they had become men with him and through him.

prestier, the political editor, was actually the pupper of a politicians, the instrument of their designs. They whisted to him the subjects for his articles which he always at at home, because, as he said, it was more quiet and at there.

o give the journal a literary flavour, two celebrated aut hors lifferent types were attached to it, Jacques Rival, the bus columnist, and Norbert de Varenne, renowned poet whimsical story-teller of the new school. Then there were critics of Art, Painting, Music, and the theatre and a inologist, all collected at low salaries from the great enary tribe of journalists. Two society women, "Pink ino" and "Patte Blanche" retailed the world's gossin, alizing in fashion, high life, etiquette and what not, with the title-tattle on the indiscretions of great ladies. Thus is Française "sailed the Sea of State and down the creeks cross-eddies of Politics."

croy was still overjoyed at his appointment as 'Chief of Echoes' when he received a little printed card on which ead: "M and Mme Walter request the pleasure of the any of M Georges Duroy at dinner on Thursday 20th ary."

This new stroke of luck, coming so soon after the othe filled him with such jubilation that he kissed the invitate card as if it had been a love letter. Then he sought out a cashier to discuss the weighty matter of funds.

A 'Chief of Echoes' usually keeps a budget out of which he pays his reporters for their stories good or middling, which they bring in one after the other like gardeners taking the produce to a fruiterer's shop. Twelve hundred frames month were, at the beginning, allotted to Duroy who intent to appropriate a fair portion of it to himself.

The cashier after great pressure had, in the end, advantable four hundred francs. He intended straight away repay to Mme de Marelle the two hundred and eighty france he owed her, but reflecting, very speedily, that this would leave him only a hundred and twenty france, which would quite insufficient to enable him to carry on his new job perly, he put off repayment to a future time.

For two days he was busy settling in. He had inherited table full of pressing correspondence in the immense represerved for the reporting staff. He presided over one of this room, with Boisrenard, his hair still coal black in spiritual coal black of his age, sat bent over his copy at the other.

The long middle table belonged to the reporters flitting and out. They usually sat on it, playing bilboquet with a sternest concentration, half a dozen of them at a time, like many Chinese images.

Duroy had himself now taken up the game and had been quite an expert, thanks to the tuition of Saint-Potin.

Forestier, increasingly indisposed, had given him his late purchase, the mahogany bilboquet, which he found a triffer the heavy side, and Duroy manipulated with vigorous at the large black ball at the end of its cord, counting: "One, two...three...four...five...six."

He had managed to score twenty points for the first to on the day that he was to dine at Mme Walter's. "A go omen," he thought, "my luck is in." For skill at bilbook was no light matter: it conferred a certain precedence in a various departments of la Vic Française.

He left early so as to have time to dress and as he was Iking along the rue de Londres, he saw a little woman pping before him looking exactly like Mme de Marelle. He to the colour mount his cheeks and his heart beating. He posed the road to look at her from the side. She turned cross also. He had been mistaken; he breathed again. He sen wondered what he was to do when he met her again, se to face. Should he acknowledge or pretend not to have n her?

'I'll look the other way," he decided.

it was cold and the gutters were frozen over. Pedestrians ked grim and grey in the gaslight.

When the young man got home, he thought: "I shall have change my diggings. This place won't do for me now." felt strung up, gay, ready to run along the housetops, and ng to his bed by the window he repeated alond: "It's come last. My fortune. I must write to father."

Ie did occasionally write to his father; and his letter always ught a thrill of happiness to the little Normandy wine shop, the roadside, at the top of the hill looking down on Rouen I the vast valley of the Seine. From time to time also he gived a blue envelope with his address painfully traced on it alumsy trembling writing. His father's letters invariably an with the same lines: "My dear son, I am happy to say tyour mother and I are well. There is nothing new in the ntry. But I may tell you...." And there was still a warm se in his heart for happenings in the village, tidings of the ghbours, news of the crops and the harvests.

djusting his white tie before his little mirror he repeated: as I must write to Dad to-morrow. If he could see me this ring in the house I am dining in, wouldn't he be thunderck, the dear old fellow?"

nd his mind went back suddenly, a little wistfully, to the ble kitchen downstairs, next to the empty coffee room, shining saucepans throwing their yellow light along the s, the cat in the fireplace, squatting with its nose to the like a Chinese idol, the timeworn wooden table with the tureen steaming in the middle of it, and a lighted candle between two napkins. And he saw the old man and work his father and mother, two peasants with their slow has rustic movements eating their soup by little sips. He remains bered every wrinkle in their old faces, the very movements their arms and their heads. He even knew what they went be saying to one another evening after evening, face to be over their frugal meal. He thought again: "Sooner or la I really must go and see them." And his toilet finished blew out the light and went down.

The whole length of the outer boulevard he was accome by street women. He shook their hands off his arm, answer ing them, "Be off. Let me alone," with violent contempt to insulting him. What they take H did didn't know how to draw the line between for? Thev men, these prowlers of the night. The feel of his black the sensation that he was going to dine with wealthy need very well known, celebrated, important people, obsessed whole being. He saw himself as a new man, a personality man of the world, of the real world, the world that matter Full of assurance he entered the ante-room lighted by bronze candelabra and handed his coat and walking stick the valets. All the rooms were illuminated. was receiving in the second and biggest. She welcomed with a charming smile and he shook hands with two men had arrived just before him, M Firmin and M Lard Mathieu, both members of Parliament and both on the see staff of la Vie Française. M Laroche-Mathieu had a w special position in the journal on account of his great in ence in the Chamber. Everyone saw in him a coming call minister.

The Forestiers arrived, the wife very lovely in pink amazed Duroy to see her obvious close familiarity with representatives of their country. She conversed confidential in lowered tones with M Laroche-Mathieu for some five mind Charles looked worn out. He had lost a good deal of win in the past month and was coughing all the time. "I've m up my mind to spend the rest of the winter in the south," said.

Norbert de Varenne and Jacques Rival came in together. en a door opened at the end of the room and M Walter ered between two tall young ladies of sixteen and eighteen, pretty and the other plain.

Duroy was quite surprised though he knew that his employer s the father of a family. He had never given a thought the girls except as one thinks of a far off country which will never see. And he had imagined them as quite small ldren and here were two young women. He experienced t slight shock which a change of view-point brings with it. They shook hands with him, prettily, one after the other, he was introduced and went and sat down at a little table, ecially reserved for them. Another guest was expected, I everyone was practically silent with that "before-dinner" straint customary among people who have little in coma, after the various avocations of their day.

Duroy was idly contemplating the walls and M Walter led out to him from some distance, obviously wanting to ke him feel at home. "You are looking at my pictures?" is accented the my—" let me show them to you," and he k up a lamp to emphasize the details.

These are landscapes," he said.

There was one of de Guillemet's vast canvases, a beach ac in Normandy under an orange sky; next to it a forest Harpiguies, an Algerian plain by Guillemet with a camel the horizon, an enormous creature with its long thin legs, sing like some strange monument. M Walter passed to ther wall, declaiming pompously like a Master of Cereaies. There were four masterpieces: "A Visit to a spital" by Gervex, "A Harvest Woman" by Bastienage, "A Widow," by Bougereau and "An Execution" by n-Paul Laurens.

The last work portrayed a Vendean priest being shot against wall of his church by a squad of revolutionary troops.

I smile passed over the solemn features of his host when y came to the next panel. "These are my whimsicalities." If first was a little work by Jean Béraud, called "The High I the Low". It showed a pretty Parisienne climbing to the top of a moving tramear. Her head was just peeping the roof and the men on their seats were smiling a pleas welcome to the fresh young face coming towards them, those standing on the platform below her were looking the young woman's legs with a very different expression greedy desire.

M Walter was holding his lamp out at arm's length laughing like a mischievous child: "What d'you think of Funny isn't it?"

Then he proclaimed: "A Rescue" by Lumbert.

In the middle of a dining table a little kitten was squatt examining with astonishment and perplexity a fly, drown in a glass of water. She had her tiny paw raised ready lift the insect out with one quick dab. But she hadn't up her mind. She was thinking it over. Would she doll in barracks teaching a poodle to play the drum.

The Director came to a Detaille: "The Lesson," a solo

Duroy laughed approval with real enjoyment: "How deline ful, how very...delight..."

He stopped short. He heard Mme de Marelle's voice, com in.

M Walter continued exhibiting his treasures and explicit ing them. He was showing a water colour by Man Lalour: "The Obstacle." It was a sedan chair halted in street by a fight between two working men, powerful fells fighting like Hercules, and peering out of the window of sedan a woman's bewitching face watching the brutal strug without impatience, fearlessly, with a kind of long admiration.

M Walter was saying: "I have many more in the of rooms, but they are not so famous, not classified yet. is my Academy floor. I buy them when the painters young, quite young and unknown and I put them in reser in my private apartments waiting for the moment when painters become famous." He added softly: "That's the to buy paintings, when the painters are young. famished with hunger then. They haven't a sou, not a si But Duroy saw nothing, listened without taking in a w ie de Marelle was in the room, behind him. What ought to do? If he greeted her would she not turn her back on or throw him some insolent contemptuous rejoinder? Fif he ignored her what would everyone think? He told self: "I must gain time." He was so taken aback he had ained to pretend sudden illness to get away.

he inspection of the pictures was over. The Director had down his lamp to welcome the last arrival while Durov an his examination of the masterpieces all over again as if admired them so much he could not leave them. He was pletely nonplussed. What was he to do? He could hear r voices and distinguish their conversation. Mme Forestier calling him now "Come here a minute, M Duroy," He ried to her. She wanted to introduce a lady friend who giving a fête and wanted it mentioned in the ' Echoes' of 'ie Française.

Yes, certainly, Madame, certainly, I'll see to it myself," eard himself stammering.

me de Marelle was quite near him now. He didn't dare round. Suddenly be thought be must have gone mad. heard a high clear voice: "Good evening, Bel-Ami. You t recognize me these days?"

sturned round like a flash. She was standing before him ing with her eyes full of fun and affection; and she was ing out her hand.

e took it shakily still afraid of some trick, some spiteful ice. But she went on serenely: "What's happened to still couldn't pull himself together and stammered: 76 had heaps to do Madame, a tremendous lot of work. er has put me on to different duties which have taken Il my time."

? We never see you now a-days."

e was looking him full in the face, and he could discover ing in her eyes but easy good fellowship; "I know; but s no reason for forgetting your friends.

me entrance of a fat lady separated them, an enormous an, very décolleté, with red arms and red checks, overed and over-coiffured and walking with such heavy clumsiness, that, seeing her unwieldly progress, one could alm physically feel the weight of her feet and massive limbs,

But everyone treated her with the utmost deference Duroy asked Mme Forestier. "Who in the world is the person ?"

"The Viscountess de Percemur, who signs herself Pat

Blanche.' '

He was stupefied, with a violent desire to burst out lang ing: "Patte Blanche! That! Patte Blanche! always thought of her as a young woman like you! So the is Patte Blanche! Well! Well! Well! It takes one's breat away!"

A servant appeared in the doorway. "Madame is served The dinner was cheerful and trivial, one of those function where one talks all the time and says nothing. Duroy for himself between the Director's homely elder daughter at Mme de Marelle. The nearness of the latter irked him little, although she seemed bright and good humoured a chatted away with her usual liveliness. He was embarrass at first, constrained, hesitating, at a loss, like a musician w has got out of tune. Little by little his self-possession return ed and their eyes continually met, questioning one another mingling, intimately, almost sensually as of old,

Suddenly he felt something touch his foot under the table Slowly he advanced his foot and pressed hers. recoil at the touch. They didn't speak, both being engage with their neighbours.

Duroy, his heart beating pressed his knee lightly again hers. A soft pressure responded. Then he knew that the love was reborn.

They talked very little. But their lips trembled every to their eyes met. The young man wanted to make himse pleasant to his employer's daughter and addressed a senter to her from time to time. She answered him just as $\mathbb{\text{M}}$ mother would have done, correctly, with exact precision, my at a loss for the right word.

On M Walter's right the Viscountess de Percemur was putt on the airs of a Royal Princess; and Duroy, hugely enjoy enself watching her, lowered his voice to ask Mme de Marelle: Do you know the other one, who signs herself 'Pink mino '."

"Yes, very well: The Baroness de Livar." "Is she of the same brand as this one?"

"No, but she's comic too. A tall cuttle-fish, sixty years old, se hair, false teeth, a Restoration piece, dressed to the riod."

"Good heavens! where do they dig out these phenomena literature?"

The wreckage of the nobility are always collected by althy upstarts."

"No other reason."

"None whatever."

Back in the drawing room Duroy went up to Mme de Marelle

"May, I see you home later on?"

" No."

Why not?"

"Because M Laroche-Mathieu always takes me home when line here. He's my cousin."

"When may I see you?"

"Come and lunch with me to-morrow." They separated without speaking again.

Duroy found the party boring and didn't stay late. As he is going down the staircase he met Norbert de Varenne, also wing. There being no rivalry between them in the journal... eir work being essentially different, the old poet now-a-days splayed a grandfatherly affection towards the young man.

"Do you mind if I come with you to the end of the street?"

id he.

"It's an honour, maestro."

They started, walking slowly down the boulevard alesherbes.

Paris was almost deserted that night, a cold night, one of ose nights—so to say—vaster than others, when the stars e more remote, when the air seems to carry to us in iey hispers something from afar, beyond the planets.

The two men didn't speak at first. Then Duroy, for some thing to say, suggested. "This M Laroche-Mathieu quite a cultured, well informed man."

The old poet murmured: "You think so?"

The younger man was surprised. He hesitated: "Wa ves. Besides he has the reputation of being one of the and men in Parliament."

"Very likely. In the kingdom of the blind, a one-en man is king. The whole lot of them are third rate been their minds are shut in between two walls-money and god They are vulgarians my friend. It's impossible to talk to fine about anything we admire. They don't speak the sm language. Their brains are at the bottom of a vase or rate pot."

"Ah! It's hard to find one man with real breadth of visit one who gives us the feeling of those great generous refreshir winds that one breaths in by the sea. I have known a fa They are dead!" Norbert de Varenne spoke in a clear k restrained voice. It would have rung through the silence. the night if he had allowed it free scope. He seemed ow wrought and depressed.

He went on: "What does it matter, anyhow-a little geni more or less? It all has to end."

He was silent. Duroy, who was in high spirits himsel rallied him, laughingly. "You are in a black mood to me maestro."

The poet answered: "I always am, my son, and so will w be in a few years. Life is a hill. As long as we are climbin we look towards the summit and are happy. But once we be reached it we look down the other side and see sudden the descent, the end, which is death. We go slowly as climb, but very quickly as we go down. At your age one carefree. One hopes for so much, which, of course, new comes. For my part, I no longer expect anything death."

Duroy laughed: "The devil! You make me shiver."

"No, you can't understand me to-day, but it'll all come bu to you-what I've told you-later on. There will come a k me, and it will come apace, far too soon, when there is end to laughter, the day when you realize that behind rything you do and think and plan is—death.

Oh! you! you don't even understand the word, death. At rage it signifies nothing. At mine it is ghastly.

Yes, one understands it, quite suddenly, one knews not how why and then everything in life takes on a different aspect, ny own case for the past fifteen years I have had a feeling fing at me, as if I had a gnawing arimal inside my body, ave felt it little by little, month by menth, hour by hour, troying me like a crumbling house. It has distorted me so upletely that I no longer recognize myself. Nothing now mains of me, of me the radiant man, glowing and fresh that has at thirty. I have seen my black hair turn white and h what masterly devilish slowness! It has taken away my skin, my muscles, my teeth, my whole former body, leaveme only a mind in despair and soon it will take that as

Yes, it has destroyed me, the field; softly, inexorably it has omplished the long destruction of my being, second by md. Every step I take brings it nearer to me, every movest, every breath hastens the hateful work. To breathe, to up, to drink, to eat, to work, to dream, everything we do, to die. In fact to live is to die.

'Oh, you doubt me, do you? Think it over just for a arter of an hour and you will see.

'What is your ambition! Love! In a few years you will impotent. And then what! Money? What will you do hit? Pay for women? When you are yourself useless? Freat and become fat and groan the long nights through ler the throes of gout!

'What else is there? Fame, honour, glory? What is the of any of them when you can no longer reap their reward the shape of love? Love, wealth, fame!

'And then after it all ! Always death to end it.

'I, now, I see it so close that I often want to stretch out my as and push it off. It covers the earth and fills space. I cover it everywhere. Every little animal crushed on the road, every leaf that falls, every grey hair appearing, my heart and tells me: 'There it is, look.' "

He went on slowly, a little breathless, raising his w oblivious of anyone who might hear him.

"And never does a single one of us return, never, preserve the moulds of statues, the types which turn out ag and again the same things, but my body, my face, my thoug my desires will never appear again, never. And all the millions, billions of beings will come into existence; they have height, eyes, foreheads, checks, mouths, as I have, never can I appear again, never a single part of me can seen again in all these countless multitudes so different "To what can we cling? To whom send out our en despair. In what can we believe?

"All religions are folly with their childish morals and the selfish, futile, ridiculous promises.

"Death alone is certain."

He stopped, took Duroy by the lapels of his coat and M slowly: "Think of all that young man, during the days a months and years and your outlook on life will be differed Try to free yourself from all that hems you in, make the superhuman effort to live above your body, your though your interests, the whole human tribe and you will understa what very little importance there is in lover's quarrels, science, in the debate on the budget, in everything."

He started walking rapidly.

"But also, you will feel the frightful agony of desput You will writhe and struggle, lost, drowned in doubts a fears. You will cry 'help me' to the wide world and no or will answer. You will hold out your arms calling to be rescue loved, consoled, saved and no one will come.

"Why must we suffer thus? There is no doubt that we we born that we might live more according to the substance that the spirit; but, because we have the power to reason there this disparity between our exalted intelligence and the immu able conditions of our life.

"Consider the lower orders, humdrum clods: they ain the greatest disasters unperturbed. Animals don't feet 1 at all."

e stopped short, reflected a second or two, then said with eary resigned air: "I myself am a lost being. I have her father, mother, brother, sister, wife, children, nor God." e added after a pause, "I have only poetry." hen, lifting his head towards the heavens where shone the nen, lifting his head towards the heavens where shone the face of the full moon he declaimed:

"Mid low'ring skies I search the clue in vain, Where reigns a ghastly moon in her domain."

hey reached the point de la Concorde. He went on: "Marry, friend. You don't know what it is to live alone at my age, tude to-day fills me with fearful depression; solitude in house, by the fire in the evening. It seems to me then that alone on the earth, frightfully alone, yet in the midst of redangers, of unknown and terrible perils; and the partiwhich shuts me off from my neighbour whom I do not w, puts him as far away from me as the clouds seen from window. A kind of fever grips me, a fever of grief and r and the silence of the four walls stifles me. It is such sep sad silence, the silence of one living alone. A silence enfolds not only the body but the mind, and when a chair ks, one's heart jumps for every sound is magnified in the rnful dreary place."

e fell silent again, then added wistfully: "When one is children would be a comfort."

bey were in the middle of the rue de Bourgogne. The stopped before a tall mansion, rang the bell, and held his hand: "Forget an old man's rambling and live accordto your age, young man; good-bye."

nd he disappeared in the dark passage.

uroy went on his way, much moved. It seemed as if he been made to peer down into some deep cavity full of 1 bodies into which he must fall himself some day.

at stopping to give passage to a perfumed lady alighting a a carriage to go into her house he breathed in eagerly lavender scent. His heart beat briskly with hope and happiness; and the remembrance of Mine de M whom he would see again on the morrow took possessi him from head to foot.

Everything was smiling on him, life was full of tender

How good it was,-hopes realized, desires gratified,

He fell asleep with a light heart and rose early to to stroll down the Bois-de-Boulogne, before keeping his app

The wind had changed in the night and it was m warmer under the April sun. All the habitués of the Bois out that morning, answering the call of the bright clear

Duroy walked slowly, drinking in the refreshing air, rant with the breath of spring. He passed the Arc de Trio and stopped in the Grand Avenue on the side opposite riders. He watched them trotting or galloping, men women, select, exclusive, wealthy, with scarcely a tone envy. He knew nearly everyone of them by name, poss exact details of their fortunes and of the secret history of lives for it was part of his job to keep a sort of catalogr celebrities and the scandals linked up with them.

The ladies passed, slim and slender in their close-fit black habits with that touch of aloofness and inaccessib inseparable from women on horseback; and Duroy am himself by softly intoning, as one does the litany in Chu the names, titles, and attributes of the various lovers rumour assigned to them.

"Baron de Tanquelet Prince de la Tour-Enguerrand. '' and occasionally this liturgy became Lesbian " Louise Michot of the Vaudeville, Rose Marquetin of the Opera."

This game greatly amused him. It was, as if he werel ing bare the eternal and profound infamy of the human r and of its pleasures, lusts and consolations, underneath t austere, remote exterior.

He said aloud: "A gang of hypocrites;" and transferred attention to the men to whom rumour assigned the most roury reputations. He saw quite a number suspected of d sharping, elegant aristocrats, who, at the best earned ir living at card tables and had no other source of livelised. Others, owning historic celebrated names, lived solely the incomes of their wives; others, men of high rank too, re, so rumour said, kept by their mistresses. He saw althy financiers, received in the most exclusive circles, lose fortunes originated in barefaced robbery. He saw itesmen too, so respected that the little tradesmen in a street bared their heads to them as they passed, whose ameless juggling in the finances of great national concerns, are no secret to those, like himself, in the know.

Everyone of them without exception, had a haughty carage, a supercilious expression and an insolent eye.

Duroy was vastly amused, repeating: "A set of crooks and arks."

A low open carriage passed, drawn at a fast trot by two hite thoroughbreds, their manes tossing in the breeze and liven by a young dainty little blonde with two grooms seated thind her. She was a notorious courtesan. Duroy halted, it would have liked to salute and applaud the pretty upstart flove who, on this promenade, at the exact hour when it was eserved for aristocratic hypocrites, had the pluck to flaunt to luxury she earned between her sheets.

He had a vague feeling that there was something in comnon between him and her, that they were like souls with ke motives and that his own success would be followed by imilar audacious exploits.

He left the Bois and half an hour later, his heart glowing with anticipation knocked at his late mistress's door.

She gave him her lips, as if there had been no rupture between them, even forgetting for a little while the shrewd aution which forbade any endearments in her house. Then he said: "You don't know how annoyed I am my dear. I was so looking forward to a honeymoon with you and now my ausband has descended on me for six whole weeks. He's taken leave. But I can't go six weeks without seeing you, especially after our little misunderstanding, so this is how

I have arranged things. You must come and dine with to Monday. I've already spoken to him about you. I will in duce you to him."

Duroy hesitated, rather worried. He had never before the experience of being introduced to a man whose wife was seducing. He was afraid that something would give away, some trace of awkwardness, a look, a word, anythin He spluttered, "No...I...I hardly like ... to ...to meet husband."

She was quite astonished, looking at him naïvely with wide open. "But why? How absurd of you. It haps every day. I had no idea you were such a simple Simon

This pricked his conceit: "All right. I'll come on Monda She added: "To make it look quite ordinary I'll ask! Forestiers; though it bores me to entertain people in house."

Till the Monday, Duroy hardly gave a thought to the com introduction; but as he climbed Mme de Marelle's st case he felt curiously uneasy, not because he had any qua about taking her husband's hand, or drinking his wine. eating his bread, but because he was afraid of something did not know what.

He was ushered into the drawing room as usual and walk Then the door opened and he saw a tall grey-bearded gent man, punctilious, correct, and wearing the ribbon of Legion of Honour, who greeted him with studied courte "My wife has often spoken to me of you. Mensieur, and am very pleased to make your acquaintance."

Duroy came forward trying to put on an expression genial cordiality and shook hands with his host with on done vigour. Then, seated, he couldn't find a word to say

M de Marelle, putting a log of wood on the fire, asked whether he had been long in journalism.

Duroy replied: "Only a few months."

"Ah, you have got on quickly."

"Yes, fairly quickly," and he started talking at random, thinking of what he was saying, about all the banal triviality customary between men who do not know one another.

Tis self-possession came back and he began to find the 12tion amusing. He looked at M de Marelle, serious, disguished, impeccable, reserved, and wanted to burst out ghing. He thought, "Yes, I've had your wife, old fellow, had your wife." And an intimate vicious satisfaction ed him, the glee of the successful thief whom no one susts. a crafty delicious mean pleasure. Suddenly he wanted be this man's friend, to gain his trust, to induce him to fide to him the secret things of his life.

Ame de Marelle came in abruptly. A smiling impeneble glance hovered over them both for a second, then she eted Duroy. Before her husband he did not dare kiss her id, as usual.

the was natural and pleasant like a person used to this t of thing, who looks upon such a meeting with its essenvicious cunning, as something quite normal and simple. rine entered and held her face up to Georges less demonstively than of old, as if her father's presence made her vons. Her mother said to her: "You mustn't call him -Ami to-day," and the child blushed, as if something serily indiscreet had been said, exposing an intimate and her guilty secret of her heart.

When the Forestiers arrived, both host and hostess were maved at the alteration in Charles. He had lost weight and our terribly in one week and his cough racked him incestly. He stated that they were leaving for Cannes the foling Thursday under his doctor's orders.

they left early and Duroy said: "I'm afraid his life hangs a thin thread. He'll never make old bones."

Ime de Marelle agreed unconcernedly: "Oh, he's done for! 's a precious lucky fellow to have found a wife like his."

Duroy asked: "Does she help him much?"

'Help him much! Why, she does everything. She is in know about everything that goes on, she knows everyone, ming to see no one. She gets what she wants, how she ats, when she wants. She can pull strings anywhere. I you, she's a marvel! And what a treasure for a man who ats to make his way in the world!"

Georges suggested: "If anything happened to him I s pose she'd marry again?''

Mme de Marelle replied: "Yes, I wouldn't be surprised she had someone in view now...a Deputy...at least, well he might not be willing...for...for...perhaps there would heavy obstacles...moral ones I mean...Anyhow there you I don't know anything."

M de Marelle rebuked her with slow impatience, " are far too fond of suspecting things about other people don't like to see it. We are not concerned with other people business. Our own conscience should govern us.

to be made a rule for everyone."

Duroy left, worried and full of vague fears.

The following day he called on the Forestiers and for them packing their luggage. Charles was stretched out a sofa and magnified his difficulty in breathing: "I shall he to be away at least a month," he said, then he gave Du a series of instructions for the paper, though everything been gone into and arranged with M Walter.

When Georges left he gripped his old comrade's hand firm "Well! So long old chap." But as Mme Forestier him out he asked her eagerly: "You haven't forgotten pact. We are friends and allies, are we not? need me in any way whatever don't hesitate. A telegram a letter and I shall obey."

She murmured: "Thanks. I won't forget." And here said "Thanks" too with deeper, softer, meaning.

As Duroy went down the staircase he met M de Vand climbing slowly up. The count looked depressed. Was it this leave-taking? Anxious to show himself a man of bree ing Duroy gave him a flamboyant greeting.

The count returned it courteously, but a trifle haughtilt

The Forestiers left the following Thursday.

CHAPTER VII

Vie Française; he put his name below several articles now, well as signing the 'Echoes', for it was the Director's policy r every contributor to take the responsibility for his own py. He wrote some spirited controversial articles and his enstant association with statesmen and politicians was preparig the ground for him to become, in time, a skilful and sourceful political editor.

He could see only one cloud on his horizon. This came from little critical journal called Lu Plume. It attacked him instantly or rather attacked in him, the chief of the 'Echoes', le chief of 'Walter's Rumour mongers', as the anonymous ribe dubbed them. There was a daily outpouring of greatic hints, innuendoes and gibes.

Jacques Rival, one day, said to Duroy: "You are very tient.

The other stammered: "What can I do? They never attack directly."

Then, one afternoon, as he came into the editorial room, bisrenard handed him the day's issue of La Plume.

"I say, there's a nasty comment in this, for you,"

"Ah! What about?"

Nothing at all really, the arrest of some old woman named phert by a vice-suppression officer."

Georges took the paper and read under the title Duroy muses himself: "The illustrious reporter of la Vie Française ok us to task yesterday for stating that an old woman named tubert had been arrested by an agent of the notorious blackailing vice-suppression squad. He says mother Aubert lists only in our imagination. Well, we now notify him that is old woman in question lives at No. 18, rue de l'Écureuil in ontmartre. We understand only too well what motives attuate these agents of Walter's Bank in supporting those of is Commissioner of Police who turns a blind eye on their racket. As for the reporter in question, he would do better future to confine himself to the retailing of the marvellous stories to which he holds the key: stories of deaths denied; next day, of battles which have never been fought, of gra political pronouncements by monarchs who have not spoken word, all the tortuous shady 'information' issued to enhance the 'Walter Profits'; or better still let him stick to his mon making reports of receptions given by would-be society wom or his recommendations of certain products, which are such fat source of revenue to him and his underlings."

The young man was, at first, more puzzled than angry.

Boisrenard went on: "Who gave us this 'echo '?" Duroy searched his memory and was at a loss. The suddenly it came back to him.

"Ah, yes, it was Saint-Potin," and he flushed had disgusted at the accusation of bribe-taking.

He cried: "Why they pretend that I'm paid to ...th

I accept money...."

Boisrenard cut in: "Certainly they do, in so many work This is awkward for you. The proprietor is pretty strong this subject. It's happening so often in the 'echoes'."

Saint-Potin came in and Duroy rapped at him: "Have w seen the note in La Plume?"

"Yes, I've just left mother Aubert's place. It is true the is such an old woman but she has not been arrested.

report had no foundation whatever."

Duroy hurried off to the proprietor's house. manner was rather constrained and not unmixed wi suspicion. After listening to the facts he said: "Go straigh away to the woman's house. Then issue a denial in such a for that they won't dare attack you in that way again. Far mo than Caesar's wife, a journalist must be above suspicion...

Duroy hailed a cab and, with Saint-Potin as his guid told the coachman to drive to 18, rue de l'Écurcuil,

Montmartre

It was a vast six-storied mansion. An old woman in woollen jacket opened the door to them, after they had climb to the top floor.

What can I do for you?" she said, addressing Saint-Potin. [e replied: "This gentleman is a police inspector and he its to have a talk with you."

he let them come in. "What is all this fuss about? A ole of days ago, a newspaper reporter came badgering me, I t think why." Then turning to Duroy she asked him t he wanted to know.

Is it true that you were arrested by an officer of the 'vice-ression squad '?'

er arms went aloft. "Never in my life, sir, never in my I'll tell you the whole thing. I have a butcher. He good meat but gives bad weight. I have seen him often o his tricks but have kept quiet. That day I ordered two nds of cutlets for my daughter and my son-in-law and I him throwing in some odd waste bones, cutlet bones yes not mine. I could have made a ragout out of the lot, but n I order cutlets, I expect cutlets and not other people's a bones. So I refused to take them. He called me a grey rat and I called him a dirty old cheat. One word led to her and soon there was a crowd outside the shop, over a fred of them, laughing their sides out. Then a policeman ed up and took us both off to the Commissioner. nd sent us back, side by side, quite friends again. But I've ly dared show my nose outside the door since, I'm so med of it."

grov asked: "Is that all?" That's the whole story sir."

bing back to the office Duroy dietated his rejoinder.

An anonymous scribbler in La Plume has tried to involve n the matter of an old woman, who he alleges was arrested he vice-suppression squad, which I deny. I have myself mother Aubert who is seventy years old at least and she riven me the facts about the whole silly business which was fling squabble with her butcher about the weight of some its which necessitated an explanation before the Commis-Such are the facts! As for the other insimuaer of Police. of the Plume's reporter I treat them with contempt. 7 are the sort of thing one does not trouble to answer, especially when their author has not the courage to $\operatorname{sign}_{\parallel}$ name to them.

"Georges Duroy."

Duroy went home rather worried in mind. "What was other man going to reply? Who was he? What was believed this violent attack?" He slept badly.

His note had been approved both by M Walter and Jacquist Rival but when he read it in print the next day, it seemed more truculent and aggressive than in manuscript form he wished he had made it more conciliatory.

It was on his mind all day, and again he slept badly, was up with the sun to buy the day's issue of La Plume. It papers had not arrived at the news shops and Duroy's min went back to the day of his first article. 'The Reminiscent of a Chasseur d'Afrique.' At last the papers came, and it shopwoman handed him an open copy of La Plume.

He gave a lightning glance over the contents and saw noting about himself. He was breathing more freely when his ϵ caught the paragraph.

"The omnipotent M Duroy of la Vic Française I given us the lie; and in doing so, he lies himse He admits now the existence of the woman Aubert and that policeman took her before the Commissioner. It only remains for him to add the words, 'attached to the vice-suppression squad,' to the word 'policeman,' to dispose of the matter. It the conscience of certain journalists is on a level with the brains.

"And I sign myself, "Louis Langremont."

Georges' heart thumped violently on his way home and dressed for the day hardly knowing what he was doing. I had been deliberately insulted and in such a way as made hesitation possible. Why? For no reason at all. All on a count of a silly prattling old woman and her ridiculous disputith her butcher.

But there was no doubt that it had now become a very send matter, and dressing quickly he sought out M Walter at h ase though it was barely eight o'clock in the morning.

M Walter was already up. He read the passage through Vell," he said, gravely, "You can't climb down now."

The young man made no reply and the Director went on: You'd better go at once and put yourself in Rival's hands." Duroy muttered some reply and hurried off to the columt's house. He was still asleep, but jumped out of bed at the and of the bell. He perused the article: "Of course, Tre bound to call him out. You'll want two seconds. Who's

1311

I haven't the least idea."

Boisrenard! How will be do!"

All right! Boisrenard."

Are you a skilled fencer?"

"No good at all."

Hell! What about the pistols?"

Not too bad. "

Good; you'd better put some practice in, while I attend to Fjob. Wait a bit."

He went into his dressing room and came back presently, shed, shaved, punctifically dressed.

Come with me," he said.

He occupied the whole ground floor of a small hotel, and he k Duroy down to the basement, an enormous place which had converted into a fencing and shooting hall. mings on to the street were bricked up.

Lighting a row of gas jets leading to the end of another alt where he had fixed up the steel figure of a man painted red and blue, he placed on the table two pairs of pistols of very latest design and began to bark out quick commands if they were on parade.

Ready?...Fire! One, two, three."

Duroy, a mere automaton now, obeyed, lifting his arm, ing aim, and firing. As a boy he had often practised bird oting with an old horse-pistol of his father's, so he hit the mmy full in the chest again and again. Jacques Rival was te pleased: " Good. . first_rate...excellent...you'll do... Ill be all right."

Then he left: "Go on practising till mid-day. Here's a ammunition and don't be afraid to blast the whole lot of it I'll come back and take you out to lunch and give you news." And off he went with great cheerfulness. Left at Duroy fired off a few shots and then sat down to think the over. "How puerile all this was! What was it going prove? Is a knave, any the less a knave after he has chastised? When an honest man has been insulted what he gain by risking his life against his defamer?" And mind, groping in the dark, recalled what Norbert de Vare had said about the essential mean littleness of men, the sque mediocrity of their ideas and thoughts, the tawdry paltri of their outlook.

And he spoke his thoughts aloud: "He was right, by 60 He felt thirsty and hearing the sound of dripping we behind him, saw a shower bath and took a drink from Then he started thinking again. It was gloomy, this ce like being shut up in a tomb. The slow far off rumbling vehicles sounded like the roll of distant thunder. What was it? The hours passed below there as they must to the prisons, nothing to mark them, nothing to look forward except the jailer bringing a meal.

He waited wearily.

Suddenly he heard footsteps and voices. Jacques appeared with Boisrenard. He proclaimed: "Everythis settled."

Duroy heaved a sigh of relief. It was all over—an apol His heart leaped. "Ah!" he stammered. "Thanks."

"Yes," resumed the columnist, "this fellow Langrer is very amenable. He accepted all our conditions. Two five paces, one shot at word of command, pistol raised, much better that way than with the aim lowered. I surer aim: I'll show you. Just watch."

And selecting one of the pistols he gave a practical destration on the dummy to prove his theory that one could with much more sureness with the arm raised than firing the hip.

"Now for some lunch," he said. "It's past mid-day

They went to a near-by restaurant. Duroy hardly spoke all. He ate because he didn't want to appear afraid, then accompanied Boisrenard to the office and carried on with work. He did it mechanically, his mind far away; but ryone thought him remarkably unconcerned. Towards the idle of the afternoon Jacques Rival came to see him. It was anged that the seconds should call for him the following rning with a carriage at seven o'clock and take him to sinet forest, the place for the encounter.

All this was blithely arranged, without his taking the least t in it, without a word from him, without any consultation h him as to whether he approved or disapproved and at h break-neck speed that he was stunned, bewildered, not ing in anything that was going on.

He got home at about nine o'clock that evening having dimed h Boisrenard who had loyally stuck to his side all day.

done, he walked with quick sharp steps up and down his m. He was too worried to think. One sole idea engrossed mind: a duel to-morrow, without the idea rousing in him thing but a confused though powerful emotion. He had a soldier, he had fired upon Arabs without any great ger to himself, much as one fires on the wild boar in the t. Summing it up, he had done what he had been made to

He had shown himself as being what he had to be. And yone approved of it, was happy about it, thought it excellent, growled out, as one does in the great crises of the mind: That a swine the fellow is!' He sat down and began to ret. He had thrown a visiting card on the little table, that is adversary, secured by Rival to verify his address. He I it again, for the twentieth time during the day: Louis gremont, 176, rue Montmartre? Nothing else.

e scrutinized the letters which appeared to him mysterious, of ominous import—'Louis Langremont.' Who was this What was his age! His figure? What did he look! How disgusting, how revolting it was that a stranger, a completely unknown to him should be actually threatening life, quite suddenly, with no reason for it, for a mere whim, account of a silly old woman who had had a row with her butcher.

à

Once more he growled angrily, "What a swine!"

He sat silent, pondering, his eyes fixed on the card all time. Anger began to mount within him against the cardler slip, a spiteful wrath mixed with a curious uneasiness, it took up a pair of scissors and poked a hole in the middle of printed name, viciously, as if he was stabbing someone.

So he was going to fight a duel with pistols. Why in world hadn't he chosen the sword? He would have got with a prick in the arm or the hand, but with a pistol angle.

might happen.

He said: "This won't do, I must pull myself together." The sound of his voice startled him and he looked behind he He began to feel very nervous. He drank a glass of water a went to bed. Once there, he blew out his light and closely eyes. It was very warm under the blankets though bitter cold in the room, but he couldn't get to sleep, tossing and the ing in vain. He became thirsty again,—got up to drink. I unpleasant question assailed him. "Am I afraid?" Why his heart beat unsteadily, at every unaccustomed sound in room? Why when the clock was about to strike did its put minary whirr give him a start? and for some seconds why he have to open his mouth to breathe so great was his opposion?

He tried to reason it out philosophically, "Am I afraid" No it couldn't be fear, since he was firmly resolved to see thing through, he had willingly agreed to the duel with shrinking. Yet he felt so profoundly uneasy that he asked his self: "Am I afraid without knowing it?" And this doubt, the uneasiness, this dismay took possession of him. If a force more powerful, more dominating, more irresistible than his own of governed him what was to become of him? Yes, what was become of him?

Doubtless he would show up at the rendezvous because wanted to. But what if he trembled? What if he faint And he brooded on that possibility on his reputation, his future.

An odd wish to see his face in the mirror took him. He lighted his lamp again. Seeing his face reflected, he hardly red ed it, it almost seemed that of a stranger; his eyes looked amous, and he was ghastly pale.

pute suddenly an idea struck him like a blow. "To-morrow this time, I may be dead," and his heart beat furiously. Turning towards his bed he saw himself distinctly lying on back in the same clothes that he had just taken off. His had that hollow look, his hands, never to move again, twaxy pallor of a corpse. He was afraid of it, that thing the bed, and so as not to see it he opened the window and red out. An icy chill gripped him from head to foot and drew back shivering.

and all the time he ceaselessly asked himself, "What am I lo? What is to become of me?"

le started to walk up and down mechanically repeating:

ull yourself together. Pull yourself together."

hen he said: "I must write to the old people in case of..." Ie sat down and taking a sheet of note paper wrote: "My r Dad and Mums." This he thought too informal in such gic circumstances and started again: "My deer father, my r mother: I am fighting a duel to-morrow and it may be "He dared not write any more and sighed heavily, other thought worried him now. He had to fight this duel. There was no getting out of it. Then what was the ter with him? He wanted to fight; was definitely and dy resolved to; yet it seemed to him that in spite of every rt of his will he would not have even the physical strength led to get to the meeting place.

ow and again his teeth chattered with a little sharp rattling e and he asked himself; "Has this fellow fought other ls? Is he an expert shot! Is he a well-known duellist! a classified?" He had never even heard of the man before, surely unless he was a noteworthy shot he would never agreed as he had done without hesitation or discussion to pistol as a weapon. Then he pictured the duel itself, his attitude, the bearing of his enemy and suddenly saw ting straight at his face a little round black barrel.

e was pretty nearly at a crisis of despair when he noticed ass on the mantel-shelf. It reminded him that he had a pint of brandy hardly touched in his cupboard. He grab the bottle and drank the fiery spirit neat in great eager gu When he put it down a third of it was gone. The effect, instantaneous. A glow like a flame burned him through through, braced his whole body, steadied his mind.

He said: "I've got a hold on myself now," and opened window.

Day was dawning, calm and cold. Above, the stars seen to be dying in the brightening heavens, and on the rails line the green, red and white signals gleamed pale and m The first engines were coming out seeking their first trait with shricking whistles.

Duroy thought: "Perhaps this is my last glimpse of that," and then reacted violently: "I won't think of a thi till the actual time of the duel. It's the only way to keep on

He began to dress. He had but one more moment of wea ness, as he was shaving he thought that this might be the k time he would look upon his own face.

He drank another draught of brandy and finished dressin The next hour was a trying period. He walked up and dow forcing his mind under control. There was a thundered knock on the door, so violent that he nearly fell down with the shock of it. His seconds,-Already! They were wrapped i furs. Rival declared: "It's as cold as Siberia." Then h asked: "Everything all right?"

"Yes, quite all right."

"You're steady?"

"Steady as a rock."

"Good. Let's be off. Have you had anything to eat and drink?"

I don't need anything."

Boisrenard had donned for the occasion a green and yellow foreign decoration which Duroy had never seen him weat

. They went downstairs. A gentleman was waiting in the carriage. Rival introduced him: 'Doctor Le Brument.' Dury shook hands with him thanking him for his presence, there ade for the back seat and sat down on something hard which ade him bound up again as if released by a spring. It was a se of pistols.

Rival objected: "No, the front seat, the principal and the octor, must sit in the front seat." Duroy slowly grasped the rmality and subsided by the Doctor's side.

The case of pistol got on Duroy's nerves. He didn't want plook at it. First he tried putting it behind his seat; it ked his back. Then he put it between Rival and Boisrenard; fell off the seat; finally he pushed it under their feet.

Conversation died down, and although the Doctor retailed an needote or two only Rival answered him. Duroy would have ked to join in, if only to prove his own imperturbability but e was afraid of losing the thread of his discourse, of giving way his worried state, and he was haunted by a torturing read that he might begin to tremble.

The landau was soon in open country. It was now about ine, and one of those rough winter mornings when Nature is right, brittle and hard as crystal. The trees were white with cost: the earth sounded under the feet, the dry air carried the last noise from afar; the blue sky shining like a mirror and he sun passing, brilliant and cold through space, east upon rozen creation rays which gave no warmth.

Rival said: "I got the pistol from Gastine-Renette. He baded them himself. The case is sealed. We shall draw lots thether they are used or the other side's."

Duroy mumbled mechanically: "Thank you."

Then Rival give him the most minute instructions, deterined that his principal should make no mistake. He rubbed n each point several times. "When you are asked. 'Are you eady gentleman?' You reply in a loud voice: 'Yes.'

"At the word 'Fire' you will sharply raise your arm and re before the count of three is completed."

Duroy mentally repeated: "At the word 'Fire' I shall raise ay arm", "At the word 'Fire' I shall raise my arm", he went over the words again and again like a child saying its

The carriage entered a wood, turned down an avenue to the right and then to the right again. Rival abruptly opened door and called to the coachman: There, by that little path And the carriage pushed its way along a little track between thickets, covered with ice-covered dead leaves.

Duroy kept on muttering to himself: "At the word Fire shall raise my arm... and thinking how a carriage accidwould settle everything. If only it would overturn, w luck! If I could only break a limb!"

But at the end of a clearing he saw another carriage and to gentlemen stamping about to keep their feet warm; and had to open his mouth, his breathing had become so painful

The seconds alighted first, followed by the Doctor and himsel Rival after taking possession of the case of pistols, walked acre with Boisrenard towards two strangers who advanced to me him. Duroy saw them salute ceremoniously, then proced together into the glade peering about sometimes on the groun and sometimes in the trees, as if they were searching for some thing that had fallen down and then flown away. measured out the paces and with considerable trouble force two walking sticks into the frozen earth.

Doctor Le Brument asked Duroy:

"Do you feel quite well? Do you want anything?"

"Nothing, thanks."

It seemed to him that he must be mad, or asleep and dream ing, that something supernatural had come upon him and take Was he afraid?

Perhaps. He didn't know. All he knew was, he was in a maze.

Jacques Rival came to him and announced with satisfaction

"Everything's ready. Our luck is in. We get the choice of pistols"—a matter of the utmost indifference to Duroy.

They relieved him of his overcoat. He submitted. They went through his pockets to see that he was carrying no papers or portfolio to protect his body.

All the time he kept repeating to himself like a prayer: "At the word 'Fire' I shall raise my arm..."

They took him up to one of the canes stuck in the ground and handed him a pistol. Then he perceived a man, standing eing him, quite near, a short, podgy bald little man wearing ectacles and quite ready. It was his adversary.

He could see him perfectly clearly but his one solitary ought was: "At the word 'Fire' I shall raise my arm and e." A voice sounded through the deep silence of the glade, roice which seemed to come from far away, and it demanded: Are you ready, gentlemen?"

Georges shouted: "Yes."

Then the same voice ordained: "Fire."

He heard nothing more, he perceived nothing, he took note nothing but he felt himself raise his arm and press with all strength on the trigger. Not a sound did he hear!

But he saw instantly a tiny cloud of smoke coming from the rel of his pistol, and as the man opposite still stood facing in the same position he noticed another little white cloud eading itself below his adversary's head. They had both d. It was over.

His seconds and the doctor examined him, running their ds over him, touching his clothes asking him anxiously: on are not wounded?"

'No! I don't think so."

augrement was also unhurt and Jacques Rival grumbled vishly: "With a cursed pistol it's always the same. Either gets off without a scratch or is killed outright. What a en weapon!"

buroy remained motionless, numb with surprise and joy. was all over." They had to take his pistol away from , he was keeping it gripped in his hand. He felt now that bould have challenged and fought the whole world.

ll the four seconds were conversing now, making an appointt to write down their depositions later in the day; and the hman, chuckling on his box, whipped up his horses and clattered off. All four of them lunched together on the evard to discuss the event. Duroy gave them his impres-

It didn't affect me at all, not in the least. You must have that for yourselves?"

Rival replied: "Yes, you took it exceptionally coolly." When the written summary was finished, they gave if Duroy who was going to publish it in the 'Echoes'. He was a nished to note that he had exchanged two shots with M L Langremont, and a trifle uneasy he spoke to Rival about it

"But we only fired one shot."

The other smiled: "Yes, one shot ...one shot each... makes two shots."

And Duroy, satisfied with the explanation, let it go that.

Daddy Walter embraced him: "Bravo, bravo, you h defended the flag of la Vie Française, bravo!"

That evening Georges showed himself in the principal ne paper offices and in all the leading cafes of the bouler Twice he ran into his adversary, doing the same thing. T ignored each other. If either had been wounded they wo have shaken hands. Each one of them swore with the utr conviction that he had heard the other's bullet whizz past head.

 \mathbf{The} next day towards eleven in the morning Du received a 'little blue.' "My god, what a fright I've h Come at once rue de Constantinople that I may kiss you love. How brave you are. I adore you.—Clo."

He kept the appointment, and she threw herself into arms, covering him with kisses.

"Oh! my dearest, if you could know how I felt when Is it in the paper this morning. Tell me. Tell me everything must know."

He told her the details minutely. She asked.

"What a terrible night you must have passed before: duel!"

"No, not at all. I slept quite well."

"I would not have closed an eyelid. And at the place itse Tell me how everything passed off there."

He gave a dramatic version: "When we were face to fa at twenty paces, hardly four times the length of this lit room, Jacques after asking if we were both ready gave command 'Fire'. I raised my arm immediately and aim hight as a die, but I made the mistake of aiming at his head Sich he moved. I am an expert pistol shot, but, I'm used to moother working one, requiring less pressure on the trigger. nust have missed him by a hair's breadth. He's a good shot the rascal. His bullet nearly grazed my temple. I felt breeze of it going by my head."

The was on her knees holding him in her arms as if to share peril. She kept murmuring: "Oh! my poor darling, my or darling....' When he had finished his account she said: feel I can't keep away from you. However awkward it may with my husband in Paris I must see you. Often I have hour in the morning before you are up and I could pop in kiss you good morning but I'll never set foot in that chtful den of yours again. What can we do?"

How much are you paying for this place?"

"A hundred france a month!"

All right, I'll take it over on my own and move in straight way. I can't live where I am now, in my new position."

the thought the suggestion over, then replied:

"No. I'm not willing."

He was astonished.

"Why in the world not?"

No particular reason. This flat suits me very well. I'll p it on."

He laughed: "But, it's in my name anyway."

"She obstinately refused: "No, I don't like the idea, at all." But at least give me a reason."

She whispered softly: "Because you would be bringing other men here and that I won't have."

He was extremely indignant. "Never, on your life. I omise."

"No, you would bring them in all the same."

I swear I won't." Really and truly?"

"Truly. I give you my word of honour. It will be our se, ours alone." She hugged him, glowing with love: "Then gree, dearest. But mind if you deceive me once, only once, will be the finish between us, forever."

He redoubled his promises and he arranged to move in same day.

Then she said: "Come to dinner on Sunday. My hush has taken a liking to you."

He was flattered.

"Really?"

. "Yes, he's quite taken to you. And listen, you remem telling me you were brought up in a château in the country "Yes, why?"

"Then you must know something about agriculture?" "Yes."

"Well, talk to him about gardening and the crops. Helm all that."

"Right. I won't forget."

She left; but not till after they had been a long time in another's arms. The duel had intensified her ardour.

And Duroy thought as he went to the office: "How com all this is! How fantastic! Does she know herself what wants and what she loves? And what a strange househol What whim of fate joined together this old man and this m cap! What kind of reasoning induced this Inspector to man this schoolgirl? Strange! Love, I suppose."

He concluded: "Anyhow, she's a remarkably tress. I should be a complete fool to lose her."

- CHAPTER VIII

s duel had promoted Duroy to the ranks of the chief numists in la Vie Française. But as he suffered from city of ideas he made a speciality of declamations on the line of morals, the slackening of principles, the fall of riotism, and the 'anaemia' of French honour. (He had self coined the word 'anaemia' and was inordinately proud it.)

And when Mme de Marelle, herself full of that mocking, ptical, sardonic, decadent with which may be termed the ul of Paris,' would sneer at his effusions, splitting them nder with an epigram, he would smile and say cheerfully: Vell. it's all building me up a first class reputation and that's

I'm out for "

Te lived now in the rue de Constantinople whither he had nsported his trunk, his brush, his razor and his soap which stituted his belongings. Two or three times a week the me woman would arrive before he was up, undress in a mte and glide between the sheets shivering from the cold side.

Duroy, on his side, dined at her house every Thursday, and de much of her husband, discussing agriculture with him, las this was a subject on which he was genuinely interested, two of them were often so engrossed in their dissertations t they altogether forgot the hostess sitting yawning and ed on a sofa.

aurine too, was lulled to sleep, sometimes on her father's e, sometimes on 'Bel-Ami's,' and when the journalist had gone, M de Marelle would never to say, in the stiff, formal tone in which he pronounced the st trivial thing: "That young man is a really nice fellow. has a remarkably cultured mind."

Pebruary was running out. In the streets in the mornings, the flower sellers' earts trundled along, one began to breathe the delicate scent of violets.

Duroy was living without a cloud on his horizon.

Then, one night, returning home, he found a letter slit under the door. He looked at the mark and read 'Cam He opened and read it.

"Cannes, Villa Jolie

"MY DEAR FRIEND. You told me, didn't you that I rely on you in case of need? Well, I have to ask of you ac service. It is to come and help me, and not let me be alm Charles's last moments. He is dying. He may not survive week. He still gets up but the doctor has warned me.

"I have neither the strength nor the courage alone to we his suffering day and night. And I anticipate with terror last moments drawing nearer and nearer. I cannot ask a one but you for my husband has no family. You were comrade; and he did his best for you, opening the doors the journal to you. I ask you to come. I have no one Believe me your affectionate friend.

"MADELEINE FORESTIER,"

A peculiar sensation, like a breath of air entered Georg heart, a sense of deliverance, of space opening out before and he murmured: "Poor fellow! Of course, I shall go. P Charles! But it's the common lot of all of us, after all."

He communicated the contents of the letter to the Direct who gave him leave. "Be as quick as you can," he growle "you are indispensable."

Georges left for Cannes the next day by the seven o'clo express, having informed the de Marelles by telegram.

He arrived the following day at about four in the evening A commissionaire took him to the Villa Jolie nestling by seaside in a little forest of fir trees, dotted with white house stretching from Cannes to Juan Bay.

It was a small low house, in the Italian style, by the side the road which climbs zigzag through the trees, showing every turn the most lovely views. A maid opened the do and cried:

"Oh! sir, madame has been waiting for you, so anxiously." He asked: "How is your master?"

'Oh! very bad, sir. He will not be with us long."

Ie was ushered into the drawing room, designed in rosek and blue. The large high window looked out over the and the sea.

uroy murmured: "By George, this is a smart little country se! Where the deuce does the money come from?"

he rustling of a dress made him turn round.

Ime Forestier held out both hands to him: "How kind of to come, how very kind of you"; and abruptly she emsed him. They looked at one another.

he was more pale and thinner, but, as always, cool and rant, and her frail appearance made her more lovely. She : "It is terrible. He knows he is lost and he bullies me htfully, poor fellow. I've told him you have come. But re is your luggage?"

I've left it at the station, not knowing what hotel you so me to stay at, so as to be near you."

10 hesitated, then replied: "You must stay here, in the Your room is heady. He is afraid of dying at any tent, and if it happens in the night I should be alone; I have your luggage sent for."

e bowed: "As you wish." Now, come up," she said.

3 followed her. She opened a door on the first floor and by perceived near a window, seated in an arm chair and pped in blankets, livid under the red splendour of the ng sun, a kind of corpse peering at him. He could ally recognize him, rather divining that it must be his d.

the room one felt the heat, the drugs, the ether, the feetants, that heavy indescribable smell of a room in h a consumptive is breathing his last.

restier raised his hand, with a slow painful deliberation. In you're here, he said, "come to see me die. I thank you." It wou tried to laugh: "To see you die! That wouldn't be I an amusing spectacle and I certainly didn't decide to Cannes for that. I just came to see how you are and for mge."

The other muttered: "Sit down," and lowered his head

if abandoned to thoughts of despair.

He was breathing in quick stifled gasps and now and a emitted a kind of groan, as if to remind the others how if was.

As he remained silent his wife opened the window pointed to the horizon: "Look at it. Isn't it beautiful?"

In front of them the hill, studded with villas sloped do to the city which lay along the whole length of the beach its head to the right towards the pier dominating the town' surmounted by an ancient watch tower and its feet the left as far as Cape Croisette facing the Lerins islets. The islets looked like two patches of green in the blue sea. T seemed so flat from above that one might have taken them two vast sheets of green paper.

And afar off on the horizon on the other side of the ba long line of blue mountains stood out against the radiants a lovely haunting picture of peaks, some rounded, some jage some pointed ending in one vast mountain plunging its f into the open sea.

Mme Forestier pointed it out: "That is the Esterel," informed them. The sky behind the dark summits wa golden fiery blood red, more than the naked eye could sust

Duroy was subdued in spite of himself by the majesty of dying day; and not finding any other term to express his a said: "Oh! yes, it is amazing."

Forestier lifted his head towards his wife: "Give me all air.''

She replied: "Take care, it's getting late, the sun's go down. You may catch cold and you know that would be

. for you in your state of health."

He made a feverish feeble gesture with his right hand ghastly simulation of shaking his fist, and muttered, with angry grimace, a grimace that displayed his bloodless lips, wasted cheeks and his fleshless bones: "I tell you I'm stiffi What does it matter, to you whether I die a day sooner of day later, since, in any case it's all up with me..."

She opened the window to its full extent.

he incoming breeze was wafted on to all three of them a kiss. It was a soft tender gentle breeze, the first breath pring fed by the perfumes of the plants and heady flowers wing on the hill side. Forestier drank it in with short rish gulps. He tapped his finger nails on the arms of his ir and said in a low, hissing, exasperated voice: "Shut the dow. It makes me ill. I would sooner die in a cellar." is wife gently closed the window, then looked far out, her pressed against the pane.

uroy, ill at ease would have liked to talk to the sick man, eassure him. But he could think of nothing cheering to e faltered: "Then you've not improved since you've been he other shrugged his shoulders with peevish impatience: nu tean see that well enough." And his head fell again, uroy went on: "It's really lovely here compared with is. There it's still full winter. It snows, hails, rains and we to light the street lamps at three in the afternoon." orestier asked: "Anything fresh about the paper?"

Nothing new. They've taken on little Lacvin in your e from Voltaire. But he's not much good; not experienced igh. It's about time you came back."

he sick man muttered: "I! come back! I shall be writing eles six feet underground soon."

Thatever the subject, that one fixed idea came back like z-work, ceaselessly reappearing in every thought, in every isc.

nadows flickering on the light of the dying fire rose and fell he room, seeming to tint the furniture, the walls, the gings, the corners with mixed hues of pink and purple. The or over the mantel-shelf reflecting the horizon, looked like eet of blood.

me Forestier still stood motionless, her back to the room, brow pressed against the window.

nd Forestier began to speak in jerky hissing tones heartling to hear: "How many more times shall I see the going n of the sun?...eight...ten...fifteen...or twenty...perhaps thirty, not more. You have plenty of time before you others...for me...it's all over... And everything will on...after me...just the same...as if I was there..."

He was silent for a little while, then went on: "Everything I see reminds me that in a few days I shall see nothing. is horrible...I shall see nothing...not a thing that exist the smallest objects that one handles...glasses...table kins...the beds one rests on so easily...carriages. A di in the evening is so pleasant.... How I used to love all that With the fingers of each hand he was making light nerve movements as if he was playing the piano on the two arms his chair. And each one of his silences was more painful the his words for they both felt that he was obsessed with the ma terrifying thoughts.

Suddenly Duroy remembered what Norbert de Varenne h said, but a few weeks before.

"I see death so close to me that I often want to stretch of my arms and push it away. It covers the earth and fil space....I discover it everywhere.... Every little anim crushed on the road, every leaf that falls, every grey h appearing, tears my heart and says to me: 'There it is, look'

He hadn't understood till that day; now, looking at For tier, he understood. And a poignant instinctive bitter angula entered into him as he knew that quite near, by the chair which this man sat gasping his life away, hideous death sto with pointing finger. He wanted to get up and be off, to sa himself, to return to Paris instantly. If he had only know he would never have come.

Night was invading the room like a mourning shadow falling on the dying man.

The window alone was visible now, its clearer light bringing into relief the young wife's motionless figure.

Forestier demanded peevishly: "Well, aren't they going to bring the lamp in to-day? There you are, that's what yo call looking after a sick man."

The shadow of the figure standing out against the winder disappeared and an electric bell rang sharply.

Presently a servant came in carrying in a lighted lamp. Man restier said to her husband: "Will you lie down, or will you lie down to dinner?" He muttered: "I'll come down." They waited a long painful hour for the meal, motionless all see of them, throwing in only an occasional word, some all commonplace as if there might be danger, some mysteriperil if they let the silence last too long in this room where th prowled.

it last dinner was announced. To Duroy it seemed long, aminable. They didn't speak. They are silently, crumby bread with their fingers between the courses; and the rant, waiting on them came and went without a sound for all whose frayed nerves could not stand heel taps, had be him don slippers. Only the regular mechanical 'tick to of the clock disturbed the unnatural uneasy quietude of room.

he moment dinner was over, Duroy pleaded fatigue and red to his room. He leaned out of the window, gazing at full moon, hanging like the globe of an enormous lamp in midst of the sky, easting on the white villas its cold, serene and spreading over the sea a sheet of soft gently trembling t. And he sought for some plausible reason to get away kly, inventing excuses, bogus telegrams, a summons back n M Walter.

ut resolutions of flight broke down in the morning. Mme estier made short work of his excuses and their only it was to deprive him of the credit for devoted friendship. I was spring now, the happy joyous spring of the South; Duroy went down to the sea, feeling that he would see quite ugh of Forestier during the day.

Then he came back for lunch the domestic said: "Monsieur asked for you two or three times, sir. Will you go up e went up. Forestier seemed asleep in his chair. His was reading on the sofa.

he invalid looked up and Duroy greeted him cheerfully: ow d'you feel now old fellow? You look fine to me this ning."

he other replied: "Yes I'm better. I feel much stronger; lunch with Madeleine as quickly as you can. We're going a drive.''

Directly she got Duroy alone the young woman said to h "To-day he firmly believes he's saved. He's been make plans all the morning. We're off at once to Juan Bay to h some pottery for our Paris flat. He's quite determined to I feel terribly frightened for him in case of an accident. hardly be able to stand the jolting of the carriage on road."

When the landau came, Forestier went down the stairs, by step, supported by his servant. As soon as he set eyes on carriage he wanted it opened.

His wife protested: "You will take cold. It's madness" He was obstinate: "No, I'm much better. I feel quite well They passed through the shady avenues with gardens either side which make Cannes resemble an English park then the long sea road to Antibes. Forestier pointed out countryside. He showed them the country seat of the Roy ist pretender, the Count of Paris, and named several other He was in high spirits, that spurious artificial transient gain of the advanced tubercular. He raised a finger, not have the strength to lift his arm.

"Now, there is St. Marguerite's isle and the châte Marshal Bazaine escaped from. We ought to have been me careful in that business."

Then he started on old regimental memories -the names the officers and yarns about them.

Suddenly by a turn in the road the whole of Swan Bay before them with its white village at one end and Ca Antibes at the other; and Forestier with childish glee end "Ah! The Fleet, that's the Fleet."

In the middle of the Bay they saw about a dozen batt ships and cruisers like huge steel-covered rocks. grim, misshapen, enormous with their turrets, jutting exer cences, planted on the water as if they had taken root und the sea.

One would hardly imagine them being displaced or remove they seemed so permanently though clumsily part of the see A great three masted sailing vessel passed among them, all sails outspread white and joyous. She looked gracious and rely amid these sinister steel clad monsters of war crouching the blue waters.

Forestier knew them all. He named them: "The Colbert, Sovereign, the Admiral Duperre, the Redoubtable, the systion,—no I'm wrong, that one over there is the Devas-m."

They came to a kind of Pavilion with a notice board: "Juan by Art Pottery Products," and the carriage, after skirting lawn stopped at the gate.

Forestier wanted to buy a couple of vases for his book-shelves, he could hardly get down from the carriage, they brought eeimens out to him, one after the other. He was a long time oosing, consulting his wife and Duroy. "You know it's for shelf at the end of my study. From my chair I shall have 7 eyes on it all the time. I want an old pattern, Greek sign." He examined the vases minutely, sending some back d making them bring others. At last he made up his mind, d having paid the bill ordered them to be sent off by post mediately. "I'm returning to Paris in a day or two," said

They started back but on the coast road, in the hollow of a valley a sudden cold breeze struck them and the invalid gan to cough. It was nothing at all at first, a trifling set-ck. Then it increased, became a continuous fit, then a sort rattling hiceup. Forstier was suffocating and as he sped desperately for breath the cough tore at his throat. othing calmed him, nothing eased him. They had to carry a from the carriage to his room and Duroy, who was suprting his legs, felt his feet tremble at every convulsion of his ags.

The warmth of the bed brought no relief from the attack nich lasted without stopping till mid-night; at last drugs numbed the fearful spasms and the sick man remained till dayeak sitting up, wide-eyed, in his bed.

The first words he spoke were a call for the barber, for he sisted on getting up every morning to be shaved. He managed to get up this time. But they had to put him but to bed immediately after and his breathing began to be quick, so hard, so painful that Mme Forestier, aghast, awake ed Duroy who had gone to bed and sent him for the doctor

He brought Doctor Gavant immediately who prescribed drug and gave his instructions but when the journalist to him aside to ask his opinion: "It's the last stage," he sai "He'll be dead to-morrow morning. Warn his wife, and get priest. There's nothing more I can do, though I hold myst entirely at your disposal."

Duroy called Mme Forestier: "He's going to die. To doctor advises sending for a priest. What would you like to

She hesitated for quite a while, then said: "Yes, it has better be done....I'll go and prepare him. I shall tell him the curé has called and would like to see him....I don't know why, I shall say. It will be very kind of you, if you'll go and find one. Be careful whom you choose. Find one who won' insist on formal ritual; one who will just take his confession without pomp or show."

The young man found an old priest who understood the situation. As soon as he went in to the dying man, Mm. Forestier went out and sat in the next room with Duroy.

"This has overwhelmed him," she said, "when I spoke the him of the priest, his face took on a ghastly expression as it as if ... as if he felt that something...had whispered to him ... you know... He understands. He knows that it is the end...matter of hours."

She was very pale. She went on: "I shall never forget the expression on his face. Certainly he looked on Death in that moment.... He saw it...." They could hear the priest in the next room. He was a little deaf and raised his voice, "No, no you're not so ill as all that. You are ill, but not dangerously. And the proof is that I'm calling as a friend, a neighbour."

They could not distinguish Forestier's reply. The old may went on: "No, I'm not going to give you communion. We'll talk about that when you're on the mend. But if you would like to avail yourself of my call to make your confession, not a very suitable time. I am a pastor, you know I use every nortunity to lead in my flock.",

A long silence followed. Forestier must have been speaking halting whispers.

Then suddenly the priest's voice assumed a different tone, at of one officiating at the altar.

"The mercy of God is infinite. Say the Creed my son. You we forgotten it perhaps. I will help you. Say after me: onfiteor Deo omnipotenti...Beatae Mariae semper virgini

He stopped from time to time to enable the dying man to llow him. Then he said: "Now, your confession..."

The young woman and Duroy did not stir, a prey to a singur anxiety, a strained anticipation.

The sick man murmured something. The priest answered m: "You have acquiesced in sin-of what kind my son?" Madeleine rose, saying simply: "Let's go into the garden. We in't want to hear his secrets."

They sat down on a garden seat, beneath a flowering rose tree mid the strong sweet scent of carnations.

After some 'minutes' silence Duroy asked her:

"Will you stay on here, before returning to Paris?" "Oh! no. As soon as all is over, I shall come back."

"In a fortnight or so?"

"Yes, or a little longer."

He went on: "He has no parents?"

"No, only some cousins. His father and mother died when e was quite young." Both of them watched a butterfly, fliting amongst the carnations, flying from one to the other with wift moving wings, which went on gently fluttering while it ested on the flower. There was a long silence.

The servant came to tell them: "Monsieur le curé has mished;" and they went into the house together.

Forestier seemed visibly more shrunken.

The priest shook hands with him: "Au revoir my son.

hall come again to-morrow." And he left.

The moment he was gone the dying man, gasping for breath ried to raise both hands to his wife. "Save me," he entreated

"Save me, my darling...I don't want to die...I want to die...Oh! save me.... Tell me what to do, go find the doctor.... I will take anything he says....I want to.... I don't want...."

He began to weep. Two large tears trickled down his was cheeks, and the thin corners of his mouth puckered like of a fretful child. His hands fell back on the bed and began slow regular continuous movement as if to pick up somelif on the sheets:

His wife was weeping bitterly: "No, no, it is nothing, i only a little set-back. You'll soon be better again. That di yesterday has overtired you."

Forestier's gasps were now more rapid than a dog's hausted after running, so hurried that one could not on them, so feeble that they could hardly be heard.

He kept repeating: "I don't want to die ... Oh! my God my God...my God...what is coming over me?...I she see anything again...anything again . . . ever . . . ever . . . my God!" He was staring before him now at something invisito the other two, something hideous at which his fixed ϵ reflected horror. All the time his two hands continued the dreadful unremitting motion.

Suddenly he began to tremble,—a violent shuddering sh ing his whole body; and he groaned: "The cemetery...for)

...my God!...,

He spoke no more. He lay still, haggard and panting. Time passed; mid-night sounded from the clock of the new bouring convent. Duroy left the room to eat a little. M Forestier refused to take anything. He came back after hour. The dying man had not moved, his thin fingers plucki all the time at the sheets as though to draw them towards face.

His wife was scated in an arm chair at the foot of the b

Duroy sat opposite her. They waited in silence.

A nurse had come, sent by the doctor; she was dozing the window. Duroy was beginning to nod himself when so premonition roused him. He opened his eyes just in time see Forestier close his own, like two lights being extinguish here was a dry rattle in his throat, and two thin threads of hod appeared at the corners of his mouth, then trickled down her his chest. His hands stopped their hideous tattoo. He had ased to breathe. His wife realized it at once. She uttered moaning ery, and sank to her knees across the bed sobbing restrainedly. The nurse, awake now, came across. er." she said. Georges surprised and shocked mechanically ade the sign of the cross, then recovering his self-possession brmured with a sigh of relief: "It's been shorter than I would."

When the first shock subsided and the first uncontrollable rief wore itself out, all the duties and services which death emands had to be done. Duroy left them before nightfall.

On his return he was very hungry. Mme Forestier managed leat a little. Then both of them settled in the death chamber keep vigil over the corpse.

Two candles flickered on the table. They were alone, the oung man and the young woman by the side of him who was more; at whom they gazed without exchanging a word or ioving.

Georges, disquieted by the darkened room, contemplated his ead friend steadfastly. His eyes and his mind fascinated, rawn by this fleshless face made to appear even more wasted v the flickering light remained intently fixed on him. This as his comrade, Charles Forestier, who only yesterday was alking to him. What a strange and terrible thing it was this omplete extinction of a human being! He recalled the words of lorbert de Varenne haunted by the fear of death.

"Never a single one of us returns, never. . Millions, billions f beings will come into existence...but never can I appear gain."

Yes, millions would be born, all more or less alike, with eyes, nose, a mouth, a skull, and intelligence within it, but never gain could be appear who was lying on that bed.

For a few years he had struggled, eaten, laughed, loved and oped like the rest of mankind. Now it was finished, for him, mished for all time. One life! A few days and then nothing. me is born, grows, is happy, hopes, dies. Farewell! man or woman, whoever you are, never again can you appear out earth! And yet everyone of us bears within him the burn unrealizable desire for immortality, each is a sort of wo within a world, and each is soon to be completely annihilat a dungheap of new germs. Plants, animals, men, stars, her pheres, all live to die. And never a one returns, insect, wor planet. A confused vast crushing terror scized Dung mind, terror of this inexorable inevitable nothingness destring each brief miserable life. He felt himself already crumbit under the menace. He thought of the flies living a few how of animals a few days, men a few years, worlds a few ag What difference was there in any of them? A few dawns mo then nothing. He turned away his eyes so as not to look the corpse.

Mme Forestier, her head lowered, seemed also plunged gloomy reflections. Her fair hair and sad face looked so low that a quick thrill like the touch of hope passed throught young man's heart. Why grieve when he had so many years life before him?

He looked at her closely. Absorbed in thought she did notice him. He said to himself: "There, anyhow, is the good thing in life: Love! To hold a beloved woman in one arms! That is the limit of human bliss."

What luck the dead man had had to meet this culture charming companion! How did they become acquainted What had possessed her to marry a humdrum poverty-strick youth? And how had she managed to make the man of his she undoubtedly had?

He thought of all the mysterious secrets locked up in ever life; and remembered the gossiping rumours about the Com de Vaudrec, how he was said to have given her dowry an arranged her marriage.

What was she going to do now? Who would marry her? member of Parliament as Mme de Marelle hinted or some clew young man with a future, a superior type of Forestier? Has she any intentions, plans, any preconceived ideas? How he would have liked to know that! But why was he so anxious about what her plans were? He asked himself the question discovered that his uneasiness arose from one of those fused secret inner thoughts which we hide even from ourse and which we find out only when we subject ourselves earching self-examination. Yes, why shouldn't he try to it the conquest himself? What a strong formidable force would become with her by his side? He would advance kly and go far, that was certain. And why should he not seed? He was fairly certain that she had a liking for him, ething more than sympathy, one of those affections which between like natures, in part mutual attraction and in a sort of silent complicity one with the other. She knew to be intelligent, resolute, tenacious; she could put her tin him. In her time of stress had she not sent for him? why? Was it not, in a way, a choice, an indication, a tion?

her thoughts went out to him just at the time when she about to become a widow, was it not because in her subcons mind she had already contemplated him as the one who do be her new companion and ally? He felt an impetuous to find out, to question her, to ascertain what her intentions. He must leave the day after the morrow; obviously he hot stay in the same house with a young woman. So must hurry; he must, before returning to Paris, skilfully, ully find out from her what her plans were, and not leave free to come back and succumb to the proposals of some man and perhaps become irrevocably engaged.

ere was deep silence in the room; the only sound was the lar metallic ticking of the clock over the mantel-piece.

e murmured: "You must be very tired?"
e answered: "I am completely crushed."

e noise of their voices startled them, sounding strangely e gloomy room. Both looked suddenly at the dead man's as if they expected to see it move, to hear him speak to, as he had but a few hours earlier.

roy went on: "It is a terrible blow for you, such a comchange in your life, an absolute upheaval of heart and alike."

e wept softly without replying.

"It is sad for a young woman to find herself alone, as will be."

She was silent.

"Whatever happens you know our pact. You can use as you will. I belong to you."

She held out her hand to him, with one of those sorrow grateful looks which remain in our hearts forever.

"Thank you," she said, "you are so good. If I dared, if there was anything I could do for you, I would say: I on me."

He had taken her extended hand and held it, pressing with a warm desire to kiss it. He decided to venture it, a drew it slowly to his mouth. The slim scented hand was wa and a little feverish. For a long time he held it press against his lips, then when he realized that the friendly can was lasting too long, he released her hand. She said grave

"Yes, I shall be quite alone; but I shall be brave."

He didn't know how to force upon her the fact that would be happy, more than happy to make her his wife. I would he tell her, at that time, in that place, before that ho He sought about for one of those convenient ambiguous of plicated phrases with a hidden meaning which express one wants them to by their calculated reticence.

But the dead body, stretched rigidly before them, hinds him, a silent barrier. For some time he had felt someth offensive in the close atmosphere, the first carrion breath wh the poor dead, laid out on their bed, wa't towards those we keep vigil over them and with which presently they will their coffin.

Duroy asked her: "Shouldn't we open the window! seems to me the air is very bad."

"Yes, please do," she answered, "I was noticing it mysel He went to the window and opened it. All the perfur fragrance of the night came in, gently flickering the flame the two lighted candles by the bed. The moon, as on other evening, spread its calm screne light upon the white we of the villas and the broad shining expanse of the sea. Du breathing it all in with both lungs, suddenly felt full rging hope as one rejoiced by premonition of coming good ings. He turned round: "Shall we go out into the fresh a little?" he said. "It will do you good."

She rose quietly and went out with him into the garden. ev sat side by side. He spoke to her in lowered tones: lease listen to me carefully and understand clearly what I Don't be angry or shocked because I speak of such a ng at a moment like this, but I shall have to leave you after morrow and when you return to Paris it may be too late. is is what I want to say. I am only a poor devil with no nev and with his way to make in the world, but I have the I and the brains to win with. I am on the way now, well the way. With a man like me, just beginning, you don't w. Well, so much the worse or so much the better. I told 1 one day in your house that my dream, the dearest wish my heart, would have been to marry a woman like you. I eat that wish to you now, to-day. Don't answer. Let me on. I am not proposing to you. The place and the time ald make that hideous. But I want you to know that you make me happy by one word, that you can have me by t word either as a brotherly friend or as a husband, as you h, that my heart and my whole being are yours to do what t like with. I don't want you to give me any answer now; vould rather we didn't allude to it any more here. But en vou come back to Paris you can let me know what you e decided. Until then don't let's say another word about

He had spoken without looking at her, as if sprinkling his is into the night, and she seemed not to have heard him, still she was, looking straight before her with fixed impensible gaze at the wide pale expanse of the sea lighted by the m.

'hey remained a long time, side by side, both silent and ughtful.

hen she murmured: "It's becoming a little cold," and ning round she went back to the bedside. He followed her. As they drew near he noticed that the body was becoming nsive; and he moved his chair farther away, unable to bear it.

He said: "They'll have to put him in his coffin in morning."

She answered: "Yes, I know; it is arranged. The undertaken is coming about eight o'clock."

Duroy sighed: "Poor dear fellow!" She gave a long shi dering sob of sorrowful resignation.

They looked on him less often now, accustomed already to the idea of death, beginning to submit mentally to annihilation which only such a short while before had revol and dismayed them who were themselves but mortal flesh

They no longer spoke, continuing their sleepless vigil, towards mid-night Duroy began to doze. When he awoke saw that Mme Forestier had fallen into a light sleep too. settled himself into a more comfortable position, grumbling "Good Lord, I must say it would be pleasanter between sheets,"

A sudden sound roused him with a start. The nurse enter It was broad day. The young woman on the chair in fro seemed as surprised as he was. She was rather pale, h dainty, fresh and graceful as ever, in spite of the long nig spent in a chair.

Looking at the corpse Duroy shuddered violently. "Look he cried, "his beard." The beard had grown in the few hou on the decomposing face, as it had been wont to grow in few hours when the face was that of a living man. They we appalled by this life continuing on the dead body and recoil from it as from some frightful phenomenon, some unnatur menace of revival, one of those abnormal terrifying even which bewilder and confound the intelligence.

They both rested till eleven o'clock. Then Charles was p into his coffin and immediately they both felt a sense of relie of a load lifted.

They faced one another at lunch with wakening desire speak of happier, more comforting things, to return to life mo that they had finished with death. Through the large op window the gentle warmth of spring penetrated, bringing with it the scented breeze of the carnations flowering outside the Mme Forestier proposed a turn in the garden and they alked slowly round the little lawn voluptuously breathing in mild air redolent with the refreshing odour of the fir

Unexpectedly she spoke to him, keeping her head turned way from him, as she had the night before

She spoke slowly in low serious tones:

"Listen, my dear friend, I have thought over...already... hat you suggested and I don't want to let you leave without ny sort of answer. I don't say, yes or no, now. We will wait and se and get to know one another better. Reflect well on your ide. Don't let yourself be carried away by an impulse or by assing infatuation. But, if I speak of this to you, before our Charles is even buried, it is because it is important that ou should know who I am, so that you will no longer nourish he hope which you expressed to me if you are not of a...of character...of the type to understand me and bear with partnership. I intend to be free, completely free always, in y acts, in my arrangements, in my comings and goings. I ould never tolerate control or jealousy or even discussion on y conduct. I would undertake, of course, never to lower or ompromise the name of any man I married, never to make im look ridiculous or be despised. But, on his side, he would ave to undertake to see in me an equal, an ally, not an inmior nor an obedient submissive wife. My ideas, I know, re not everyone's but I shall not change them in any way.

Now, I've been completely frank.

"Let me add one thing: don't reply; it would be useless and mwise. We will see one another again and talk it all over, rhaps, much later on. Now, you go out and have a look ound, I'm going back to be near him." He slowly kissed the and she held out to him and went away without a word.

In the evening they saw one another only at dinner. Immeliately after they retired to their rooms, thoroughly tired out. Charles Forestier was buried the next day without pomp or show in the Cannes cemetery. And Georges Duroy booked his seat in the Paris express leaving at one-thirty.

Mme Forestier saw him off at the station. about the platform talking of everyday affairs till the tal

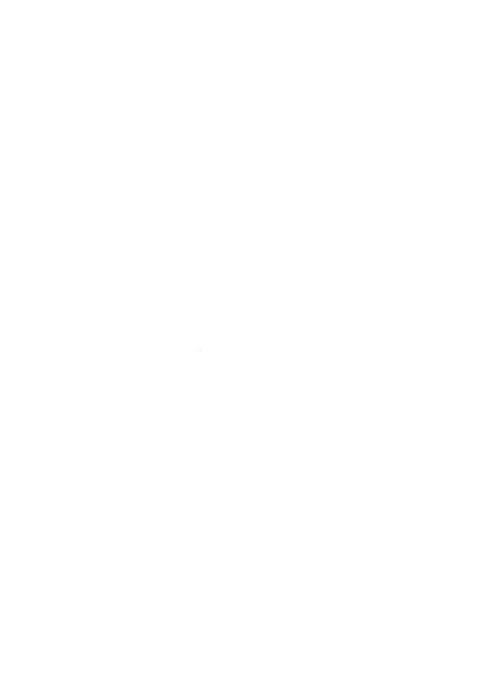

The journalist arranged his belongings, then got out ag for another few minutes' talk with her. He was suddel seized with sadness, grief, and a violent regret at leaving as if he was going to lose her forever. Someone shouted. aboard for Marseilles, Lyons, Paris;" Duroy got in, bent of the door for a farewell word or two. There was a whistle w the train pulled softly out of the station.

The young man leaned out of the carriage watching standing motionless looking after him. Suddenly just bets he lost sight of her, he put both hands to his mouth and the her a kiss.

Shyly, hesitatingly, she returned it.

CHAPTER I

DURGES DURGY had resumed all his old habits. Settled again in the little ground floor flat, in the rue de instantinople, his life was uneventful, discreet, like that of man rehearsing a new existence. Even his relations with me de Marelle had taken on a kind of conjugal respectality, as if he was practising, in advance, the coming event: d his mistress, surprised and amused at the humdrum anguillity of their union chaffed him about it.

"You are more husband-like than my husband; it was rdly worth the trouble of changing over."

Mme Forestier had not come back. She lingered on at mnes. Eventually she wrote to him fixing the middle of oril for her return, but made no allusion whatever to the cumstances in which they had parted. He waited. And if e was in two minds and hesitating between them, on his part was determined to win her over and to take every possible eans to bring about their marriage. He had faith in his ck, the seductive power ha felt within him, that power, vague t irresistible, with which he could subdue every type of man.

A short note warned him that the decisive hour was at hand. "I am in Paris. Come and see me.

"Madeleine Forestier."

Not a word more. It came by special messenger at nine clock; and at three the same afternoon, he was in her house. She held out both hands to him, smiling her characteristic en, pleasant smile. For some seconds their eyes met. Then e murmured: "How good you were to have come to me in at terrible time." He answered, "You could have comanded anything and I would have done it." They sat down id she insisted on all the news, of the Walters, of their illeagues on the journal, of the paper itself.

"I miss it a great deal," she said, "tremendously. I had come a journalist in my heart. Do you know that is my real métier."

She became silent. He thought he understood, that the was in her smile, in the tone of her voice, in the words the selves a kind of invitation; and although he had made up mind not to rush things, he heard himself faltering.

"Well!...why...why not resumo...that métier...under under the name of Duroy?"

At once she became serious and laying her hand on his a she said: "Don't let us speak of that yet."

But he assumed that she was accepting him. He fell on knees to her, self-possession gone, kissing her hands passi ately, awkwardly, clumsily saying over and "Thank you...thank you.... How I worship you!"

She rose. As he did so too he saw that she had been very pale. Then he realized how much he had missed her, wh she meant to him, how he had longed for her; and as the stood face to face, he clasped her to him and pressed on h brow one long kiss, tender, serious, grave. For a moment on her head rested on his breast, then she freed herself and sa quietly:

"Listen my friend, I have not yet decided anything. St it is possible it may be 'yes'. But you must give me you word to keep it an absolute secret till I release you from the promise."

He swore it and left, his heart bursting with happiness.

From that time he was discretion itself in his visits to be He did not ask her to put her acceptance in more formal word for she had a way of speaking of the future, of saying "late on", of making plans ahead in which their two lives wer intermingled, which continually supplied an answer, a bette and more delicate one than any precise promise.

Duroy worked hard and spent little, saving money so as m to be married without a sou. He became as miserly as he has been prodigal. Summer passed, then autumn with no on suspecting anything. They saw but little of one another an then only in public.

One evening, holding his eyes with her clear gaze Madeleim said to him.

'You haven't discussed us with Mme de Marelle, have you?'' 'No dear. Since you bound me to silence, I've not spoken word to a living soul.''

Well, it's time to tell her. I'll tell the Walters myself. I'll do it this week, shall we?'' slowly her eyes left his, as if not to notice his embarrassat, then she added: "If you like we could be married at beginning of May."

Ie coloured, "Yes, to-morrow."

le expressed himself delighted.

'I would like it to be the tenth of May because that's my thday."

'The tenth of May it is.''

'Your parents live near Rouen, don't they? I think you told so.'

'Yes, near Rouen at Canteleu.''

'What are they?''

'They are...they are small gentry.''

'Ah! I very much want to meet them."

Ie hesitated, confused: "But...well...they are..."

Ie pulled himself together and played the man: "Dear, they peasants, village innkeepers, who bled themselves white to d me to the University. Mind, I am not ashamed of them their...simplicity...their countrified ways might bore you." he smiled delightfully, her face beaming good humour.

No. I shall love them. We must go and see them. I inon it. I am the daughter of little people myself...but I them both. I have no one in the wide world...' she took hand and added "...except you."

and he felt himself moved, softened, conquered as he had er before been by any woman.

I have an idea," she said, "but it's rather hard to exn."

fe asked what it was.

Well, it's rather an awkward thing to speak about...but I e like all women my...weaknesses, my small failings, I love it glitters and resounds. I would have loved to bear an tocratic name. Couldn't you...on our marriage...ennoble yourself a little?"

He reddened as if she had suggested something indelign him, then replied frankly—"I've often thought of it my but it didn't seem easy."

"Why not?"

He laughed: "Because I'm afraid of looking a fool," "Not at all, not in the least. Any number of people and no one scoffs. Cut your name in two: Du Roy. will be splendid."

He answered quickly, like a man who had considered matter before.

"No, that won't do at all. It's too transparently a dod too common, too well known. I had thought of taking the m of my district, just as a literary nom de plume at first, the little by little tacking it on to my own and, finally but m later, dissecting my name as you suggest."

She asked: "Your country is Canteleu?"

"Yes."

She pondered over it: "No, I don't like the ending of Let's see if we can't modify the word somehow-Cantelen,

She had taken up a pen and was scribbling names study them intently. Suddenly she exclaimed, "Here it is. I've; it!" She held out a sheet of paper to him and he read on "Madame Duroy de Cantel."

He thought over it for a little and then solemnly announce that he approved of it and that it was excellent.

She was enchanted and kept on repeating: "Duroy de Ca tel, Duroy de Cantel, Madame Duroy de Cantel. It is sple did, splendid."

She added with an air of conviction: "And you'll see he easy it will be to have it accepted by everyone. But we mu take this chance. It will be too late afterwards. From morrow you are to sign your articles D. de Cantel, and yo news items simply Duroy. The latter will appear everyde in the press and no one will be surprised at your havin adopted it as just a pen name. From the moment we a married we shall begin to edge in the new name, by telling of friends casually, that you had renounced your du throug odesty until you had established your position, or we might yen say nothing at all. What is your father's name?"

"Alexandre"

She repeated the name two or three times: "Alexandre, lexandre" testing the sound of the syllables, then she wrote wn on a sheet of white paper:

"Monsieur and Madame Alexandre du Roy de Cantel have le honour of announcing the marriage of their son, Monsieur eorges du Roy de Cantel to Madame Madeleine Forestier." She looked at the writing from a little way off, ravished ith the result and then declared: "With a little method, one in succeed in anything one undertakes."

In the street again, and quite determined henceforth to call mself du Roy, and even du Roy de Cantel, he seemed to himif to take on a new importance and dignity. He walked more rogantly, held his head higher, twirled his moustache more excely, as became an aristocrat taking his stroll. He exextended within him a kind of happy desire to inform passersi: "I am called du Roy de Cantel."

But he was hardly within doors before the thought of Mme Marelle worried him, and he wrote her at once, making an pointment for the next day.

"It's going to be hard," he thought. "I'm in for a first ass hurricane." Then with the characteristic escapism hich enabled him to ignore the disagreeable things of life he arted a whimsical article on the proposed new taxes intended stabilize the Budget, in which he muleted wearers of the dribbon at a hundred francs a year, and the nobility, from ron to prince, at from five hundred to a thousand.

He signed it: D. de Cantel.

In the morning he received a "little blue" from his mistress ying she would arrive at one o'clock.

He waited for her with some trepidation but quite resolved rush things, to tell her everything frankly from the onset; en, after the first shock, demonstrate to her dispassionately at he could not remain a bachelor for ever and that, as M marelle seemed obstinately determined to live, he had to ink of someone other than herself for a lawful spouse. It was all very simple really.

But he felt nervous none the less, and when the bell his heart pounded violently.

She threw herself into his arms. "Happy days, Bel-Am —then realizing his cold response she looked at him a demanded:

"What's the matter?"

"Sit down," said he. "We're going to have a straight talk She sat down without removing her hat, only raising veil, and waited. His eyes dropped; he was preparing opening; and began in slow level tones.

"My dear friend, you find me terribly worried, terri grieved, terribly embarrassed at what I have to own to v I love you so much, truly I love you from the bottom of heart, and the dread of giving you pain hurts me more e than the news I have to break to you."

She went deathly white, beginning to tremble, and falter

"What is it? Tell me quickly."

He spoke in sad but resolved tones with that sham depr sion that we make use of to convey bad tidings.

"I am going to be married."

She uttered a groan, that of a woman about to lose con ousness, a grievous stricken sob and began to struggle breath, speechless, suffocating.

As she said nothing he went on: "You can have no idea l much I have suffered in coming to this decision. But I h neither money nor position. I am alone, lost in Paris. I m have someone near me, an adviser, a consoler, a prop, as port. It's an ally, a partner that I have sought for,-and I have found."

He was silent, hoping that she would answer, steeling h self to frantic rage, violence, personal injury.

Her hand was pressed against her heart as if to hold it and she breathed in hard painful gasps, her whole body, e her head, trembling.

He took her hand resting on the arm of the couch; she t it violently away. Then murmured as if in a stupor: "G ...my God!..."

He knelt down before her, not venturing to touch her, more oved by her silence than he would have been by any reoaches: "Clo, my little Clo, think of my plight, try to underand how I am placed. Oh! if only I could have married that would have been ideal happiness! But you are arried. What can I do? Think, dearest, think. I have to tablish myself in the world and I can't do it, so long as I we no background, no home life. If you only knew!... There we been times when I've wanted to kill your husband...." spoke very gently, making his voice persuasive, seductive, unding like music to the ear.

He saw two large tears gather slowly in his mistress's staring s then trickle down her cheeks while two more formed to low them. He entreated her: "Oh! don't weep, Clo, don't en...you are rending my heart."

Then she made her effort, a gallant effort for dignity and ide, though when she spoke it was in the quivering tone of a man about to break down.

"Who is she?"

For a second he hesitated, then realizing it was useless: "Madeleine Forestier."

Mme de Marelle, shivered throughout her whole body. She s silent, concentrating with so much intensity that she seemed have forgotten that he was there at her feet. And two msparent drops ceaselessly gathered in her eyes, fell and med again. She rose. He knew that she was leaving him thout saying a word, without reproaches, without forgivess; and he felt stricken, humiliated to the quick. He wanted keep her back and gripped her dress feeling through the terial her round limbs stiffen to resist him. He supplicated: on't leave me like that, I beg of you."

She gazed at him, with that moist despairing eye, lovely, rowful, showing all the grief in woman's heart, and mur-red:

Thave... There is nothing I can say...there is...nothing ando.... You...you are right...you...you have chosen... sen wisely...what you want...

And freeing herself with a quick movement she was gone, and he made no further attempt to detain her.

Once alone, he got to his feet, stunned as if he had receive a blow on the head; then he pulled himself together, utters "Well, for better or for worse it's over anyway...and wout a scene. That suits me." And relieved of an enormal load, feeling himself suddenly free, delivered, all ready for new life, he began shadow boxing against the wall, launch mighty blows with his elenched fist in a sort of frenzy of seess and power as if he had been battling against Destiny; when Madeleine asked him "Have you told Mme de Marell he answered her easily and naturally.

Her clear eyes searched his: "And was she not upset?"
"No, not in the least. Far from it. She thought it an it match."

Their engagement was soon known. One or two were a nished, others pretended they had known it all along, the smiled and let it be assumed that they were not surprised

The young man who now signed his articles D. de Car his reports Duroy, and his occasional political contribute du Roy, passed at least half his time at his fiancée's house treated her with sisterly familiarity, into which there be to creep a real though hidden tenderness, desire concealed if it were a weakness.

She had decided that the marriage should be comple secret, with only the two witnesses present and that they we leave the same evening for Rouen. The next day they we visit his old parents and stay for a short while with them

Duroy was against the idea and tried hard to make her; it up, but, in the end, she had her way.

The 10th of May came round. They dispensed with any: gious service since there were no guests and after a shorter mony at the Registry Office the six o'clock evening train f Saint-Lazare bore them off on the way to Rouen. They hardly exchanged a dozen words when they found themse alone in the compartment. A long look passed between t and they began to laugh. It was to hide a certain embarament which neither wished the other to notice. The t sed smoothly through the long Batignolles station and ened the wide bare arid plain running with the Seine fortitions. From time to time Duroy or his wife uttered some monplace platitude, then gazed out of the window again. Asnières bridge the view of the river with its barges, fisher-1, and scullers brightened them up. The sun, the strong of May spread its bright rays on the small craft and upon still, placid river almost without current or eddy, as if dued under the heat of departing day. A sailing ship in river had stretched over its two banks, two great triangles mow white canvas to coax the faintest whisper of a breeze. ooked like some great bird ready for flight.

proy murmured: "I love the country round Paris.

nv happiest memories are here."

he answered: "And the little yachts. How pretty they gliding along the river in the sunset."

hey fell silent as if both realized that these spoken recolons of their past lives were unwise; perhaps they were adv musing on the poetry of regrets. Sitting opposite his Duroy took her hand and softly kissed it.

When we get back," he said, "we'll come here sometimes ine."

me came back to earth in her matter-of-fact way: "We I have lots of things to attend to." It was as though she : "Be realistic. The sentimental has to be sacrificed to practical."

e retained her hand, asking himself uneasily how he was roceed to caresses. The ignorance of young girls had never bled him; but the alert, subtle intelligence that he sensed Madeleine made him feel awkward. He was afraid of ing a fool of himself, of looking ridiculous, of being too squeezed her hand with gentle pressure, without the response from her to his appeal.

t seems so strange to me that you are my wife."

e looked surprised: "But why?"

don't know. It just seems odd. I've always wanted to you in my arms and now I'm surprised at having the right to."

She calmly offered her check to him. He kissed it as if were a sister's.

"The first time I saw you, (you remember at that dimparty Forestier invited me to?) I said to myself: 'Parble if only I could discover a woman like her!' Well! It's du I have her!'

She looked at him sedately but with her bright clear smiling: "That's nice of you," she answored.

He thought: "I'm too cold. I'm clumsy. I must go at more quickly;" but all he said was: "How did you get know Forestier?"

She answered with teasing malice:

"Are we going to Rouen to talk about him?"

He coloured: "I'm an ass. But you do make me so we vous."

She was delighted at that: "I! Impossible! Make nervous!"

He moved across and sat at her side, very close.

She exclaimed "Oh! a deer!"

The train was going through Saint-Germain forest: and had seen a frightened stag leap a ditch at one bound.

While she was gazing out of the open window, Duroy so ped and kissed her a long kiss, a kiss of love by the tiny of at the nape of her neck.

For appreciable moments she remained still, then raised head: "You're tickling me. Stop it please."

But he persisted, his lips moving softly over the white in a long sensuous languorous caress.

She moved restlessly: "Now please, no more."

His arm crept round her. He pressed her to him. This lips assailed hers, like a hawk darting on its prey.

She struggled, pushed him away, tried to free herself. She succeeded at length and said again: "Stop it now."

He hardly heard her and strained her to him again a suffocating her, kissing her with greedy trembling lips, true to force her back at full length on the cushions.

With a great effort she struggled free again. She stood itely. "Now listen Georges, this must stop. We're not en, either of us. We can easily wait till Rouen."

sat down again, very red in the face, chilled and subdued r commonsense realism. Then he got himself under connd said cheerfully:

Il right, I will wait. But I'm so done up now that I t be able to speak a dozen words till we get there; and note that we are only just passing Poissy."

Il do the talking," was her reply, and she proceeded to with cool precision, her subject being their plans for the 3. They must keep on the flat she had occupied with rst husband, and Duroy was to inherit both Forestier's md his salary.

this she had settled before their marriage, with the dness of a business man, as well as all the financial sof their home life.

e marriage had been upon the separate estate basis and ad foreseen and provided for every possible future concey; death, divorce, the birth of one or several children, roung man brought into the partnership, four thousand is he told her, but of that sum he had borrowed fifteen red. The balance represented what he had managed to by in the year before the wedding. The young wife buted forty thousand which she explained Forestier had er. She referred to him, citing his example, "He was a saving fellow, steady and a hard worker. In a very little he would have made a fortune."

roy was not listening; his thoughts were elsewhere.

stopped, cogitating and then went on:

hree or four years from now you should be easily earning thirty to forty thousand francs a year. That's what es would have done if he had been spared."

orges, who began to find the lesson a trifle on the long answered: "It seems to me that, after all, we are going uen to discuss him."

tapped his cheek lightly: "True. That was naughty of

She laughed happily.

was ostentatiously holding his hands on his knees like a disciplined little boy learning his lessons.

"You do look comical like that," she said.

He answered: "It's my part that you are drilling into every minute and I'll not stray from it."

"Why?"

"Because you are taking over the direction of the house all our affairs and even of my person. In fact you have expert qualifications of a widow."

She was taken aback.

"Now what exactly do you mean by that?"

"That you have the practical experience that will dispels ignorance and the expert knowledge of the technique marriage which will polish up and smarten my bachelor in cence, that's all."

She cried: "That's coarse."

"It's true, none the less. I know nothing of women, nothing, but you do know all about men, for you are a widow you are going to educate me maritally...to-night...and if y like you can begin...at once."

She was greatly amused.

"Well, upon my word, if you're counting on me for that.

He went on in the voice of a college student coming syllabus.

"Certainly...I do count upon it...I count upon you to g me a solid course of instruction...in twenty lessons...tent the elementary preliminaries...the theory and grammar of ...ten for the rhetorical side and practical and technidemonstration... Me! I don't know a thing about it." She laughed deliciously.

"How silly you are!"

"And as you are beginning to 'thee and thou' me I v follow your example and I say to thee, my darling, I love t more and more from second to second and I find Rouen v far off indeed."

He began to put on the stagey intonation of an actor was a happy suggestiveness and exaggeration of manner what amused the young wife, used as she was to the unconvention ways and broad jests of that greatest of all Bohemians iterary man.

She looked at him covertly, finding him really charming and feeling that desire we all have to pluck the fruit from the ree, contending with the voice of reason which counsels us to wait till dinner and eat it at the proper time.

Then she said blushing slightly at the thoughts which were weakening her. "My little pupil, profit by my experience, my very wide experience. Kisses in the train are worth nothing.

They upset the tummy."

The blush deepened and she whispered: "There's no need to cut down the corn till the harvest.

He chuckled, excited by the double meaning of the words soming from her pretty little mouth; and, making a mock solemn gesture, with a movement of the lips as if uttering a prayer he declared: "I am putting myself under the protection of Saint Anthony, patron of the tempted. Now I am iron."

Night came on softly, with its transparent shadow enfolding is with a light veil the open countryside on their right. The train followed the course of the Seine, and both of them negan to look down on the river displaying itself like a huge iband of polished metal, and the reflections red, purple, flame poloured of the dying sun, little by little, sadly, diminishing, leepening, darkening. And the country plunged itself into high with that sinister chill, that chill of death which every wilight brings about on earth.

The melancholy of evening came through the open windows and entered both minds so carefree just before. They were alent now.

They had drawn close to one another to watch this agony of the day, of this fine clear day in May.

At Mantes the little oil lamp was lighted, spreading its frail rembling yellow light on the grey drapery of the cushions.

Duroy loosened his wife's clothes and pressed her to him. Its desire so piercing but a little while ago had given place tenderness, a languorous tenderness, a gentle wish for little comforting caresses, the soft endearments with which one alls little children to sleep.

He murmured very gently: "I will love you my little Made."

The kindness in his voice moved her and she offered him her mouth, bending over him as his head leaned against the warmth of her breast.

A kiss, very long, quiet, profound; a start; a rough will embrace; a short panting struggle; a violent uncouth clums coupling. Then they lay passively in one another's arms, a little frustrated both of them, weary but tender still, till the whistle of the train announced an approaching station, Strumming with her fingers on the ruffled hair at his temples, she declared: "That was very crude. We behave like a pair of street urchins."

He was kissing her hands, going from one to the other with feverish speed, and only replied: "I adore you my little Made.''

Till they reached Rouen they sat motionless almost, chee against cheek, eyes on the black night or watching the occa sional lights of houses flitting by, happy in feeling the physical nearness to one another, and in the glowing anticipa tion of a fuller, freer, more unguarded union.

They put up at a hotel looking out on the quay, and after a little-very little-soup went to bed.

The chambermaid wakened them the next morning as the clock struck eight.

They had their morning tea in bed. Duroy gazed on his wife. Suddenly, impetuously he seized her in his arms with the joyous thrill of a man who knows he has found a treasure

"My little Made, how much I love you...how much...how much."

She smiled—that assured confident charming smile—returning his kisses. "I, also...maybe."

He was still uneasy about the visit to his people. Already he had often forewarned her, prepared her, sermonized about it. He started it all over again. "Mind, they are peasants real ones, not comic opera rustics."

She laughed: "Don't I know it! You've told me often enough. Come, get up and let me get up too."

He jumped out of bed and began pulling on his socks. "We shall be very uncomfortable in the house, most unmfortable. There's only an old bed with a straw mattress They know nothing about eider-down at my room. antelen."

She seemed delighted: "So much the better. It'll be nice sleep badly...close to ...close to you...and to wake at cockow. ',

She had reached for her peignor, a filmy thing of white silk nich Duroy at once recognized. The sight of it irritated m. Why? He knew well his wife possessed a dozen of these ming fripperies. He could not expect her to destroy her pusseau and buy a new one. None the less he would have eferred that her lingerie of the bedroom, of the night, of love. d been different from that which she had worn for the other m. It seemed to him that the thin transparent material had ot something of its contact with Forestier. He walked across the window and lit a eigarette.

The sight of the harbour, of the wide river mouth full of aceful sailing vessels and squat tramps with their paddles isily whirling, moved him familiar though it was.

"How beautiful it all is," he exclaimed.

Madeleine ran across and with both hands on her husband's ulder, leaned over him, peeping out. She was charmed, lighted.

"Oh! how lovely! how very lovely! I never knew there were many ships anywhere."

They left an hour later, for they had written the old people it they would arrive for lunch.

A venerable open cab rumbled them along shakily, and as sily as an iron foundry. They passed down a long ugly ilevard, then through flowery meadows, and began to climb hillside.

Madeleine snugly settled in the depths of the old carriage, s dozing under the sun's warm caress, like one lying in a rm bath of light and fragrant country air.

Her husband roused her.

'Look,'' he said.

They had come to a halt at the famous viewpoint known I renowned to travellers the world over.

Below them lay the great valley, noble and majestic will the clear sparkling river running from end to end through dotted with countless islets, curving gently as it drew no Rouen. The old city was spread out on the right bank, fair like in the dim mist of the morning with the sunbeams on roof-tops, its thousand fantastic spires and turrets delicate frail like giant toys, its square and round towers with the heraldic crowns of bygone chivalry, its gothic belfries campaniles and dominating all the vast cathedral and its sha spire like an arrow of bronze, the tallest, perhaps, in world.

The sheer leveliness of it all took their breath away, and coachman settled himself to a long wait, knowing from exper ence its effect on travellers of every race.

They resumed their drive. Suddenly Duroy saw two people several hundred yards away. He leapt out of the ef "There they are," he exclaimed. "I recognized them in second."

Two peasants were ambling towards them, not too stead on their feet, stumbling a little and occasionally colliding. T man was short, stocky, ruddy, stoutish, and vigorous, in spi of his age, the woman, heavy, withered, bent, and dreary, typical rustic working woman who has toiled from infanc laboured stoically while her husband gossiped and drank w his customers.

Madeleine had got down from the cab. She looked at if two poor old souls stumbling along with a tightening at h heart and sorrowful pity that she had never anticipated.

They failed to recognize their son in the splendid gentlement and would never have taken the lovely lady in her smart dre for their daughter-in-law. They were hurrying on with speaking to meet their child, not bothering about gentry tray ling in carriages.

They had already passed when Georges hailed them wi a laugh: "Top o' the morning, Papa Duroy."

Both pulled up short, astounded. The old woman spo first. "It can't be you," she faltered.

"Certainly it is. It's little Georges," he answered, an mning to her, kissed her on both cheeks, the hearty kiss of a n. Then he did the same to his father who had doffed his t, the very tall black silk-peaked hat peculiar to Rouen, like butcher's head dress.

"This is my wife," announced Georges, and they peered at adeleine, as one examines a phenomenon with uneasy apprension mingled with a kind of sneaking approval on the ther's side, and jealous dislike on the mother's. The man use natural joviality was reinforced by that born of sweet ler and brandy, grew bolder and with a mischievous wink, manded a kiss. "Why not?" his son answered and Madene, very uncomfortable, tendered both cheeks to the asant's slightly liquid salute, immediately after which he ped his lips with the back of his hand.

The old woman, too, kissed her son's wife but with unendly reserve. No, this was not the daughter-in-law of her sams, this was no plump, fresh farm hand, red as an apple I round as a brood mare. She looked more like a trollop, a fine lady with her fineries and her smell. For all perfumes re to the old woman simply a smell.

They started walking behind the cab, which went on with luggage.

the old man took his son by the arm, and, keeping him the rear, asked with interest:

'Tell me, how are you getting on in the world?''
'Very well indeed.''

I'm glad to hear that. What about your wife, is she well

Forty thousand frames."

he father gave a prolonged whistle of admiration and was nuch overcome by the amount that he kept muttering for e time in an awestricken way to himself. Then he said a great conviction: "There's no denying she's a fine re of a woman." For the old man found Madeleine to taste; and in his day he had passed for a connoisseur of len.

ladeleine and the mother walked along together, without langing a word, till the two men joined them again.

They reached the village, a mere roadside hamlet, consist of ten cottages on each side of the road, a few of brick rest mud huts, some slate-tiled, the majority thatched. Far Duroy's beershop "The Good Prospect," a paltry little h ment with a ground floor and a loft was at the beginning the row on the left. A pine branch, fastened over the indicated, in traditional country fashion, that thirsty so were welcome.

Lunch was laid in the dining room of the inn, on two tables pushed together, and covered with two table cloths. neighbour, pressed in to help, curtseyed reverentially at sight of a great lady guest and then recognized Georg "Good Lord!" she said. "It can't be our little imp!" to whi he answered cheerfully, "Yes it is, Brulin dear," and kiss her as heartily as he had his father and mother.

He turned to his wife. "Let's go into our room. You o take off your hat." They went into a cold brick-tiled room, a door on the right, with limed walls, and his bed cover with a cotton blanket. There was a crucifix over a holy wat basin, with two coloured prints presenting Paul and Virgin under a very blue palm tree, and Napoleon the Great on yellow horse, the sole ornaments in the dull depressing roof

As soon as they were alone he took Madeleine in his am "D'you know Made, I'm glad I came? When I'm in Par I never give the old people a thought, yet when I come but it's a joy, somehow."

But his father was banging on the flimsy partition with "Come on, come on, the soup's ready." And in the had to go.

It was the long drawn out meal of the country, a whole lo of badly assorted courses, pigs' chitterlings following a le of mutton, and an omelette the chitterlings.

Father Duroy, livened up by eider and copious draughts wine, launched forth on his stock stories, those he kept for high days and holidays, broad clumsy aneedotes about h friends. Georges knew everyone of them by heart, by laughed dutifully, stimulated by his native air, gripped by h innate love of the countryside, rediscovered memories, of ights reviewed, tiny things like a cut in the door, a broken hair recalling some boyhood event, the smell of the soil, the ighing of the trees in the nearby forest, the spell of the little fream, the cattle, of home.

Mother Duroy said nothing; stern and aloof the whole time, it is eyed her daughter-in-law with growing aversion in her eart, that hatred of the old working woman, the old yokel ith fingers worn and limbs deformed by ceaseless toil, for this right city wife, the type of everything she disapproved of and condemned, this fast hussy made for sloth and sin.

Madeleine ate scarcely anything, hardly spoke, sitting still, ith her customary smile on her lips, but it was a fixed smile ow, sorrowful, wistful, resigned. She felt frustrated and warted somehow. But why should she? She had wanted to me. She had known quite well that she was visiting untry yokels, humble villagers. The reason was, she had sen idealizing them. She, who never dreamed, had been reaming.

"Was that it?" she asked herself. Do women always long reverything except what actually is? Had they seemed one poetic from afar off? No, but a little more articulate maps, a little less uncouth, a little kinder, more affectione, a little more picturesque. Certainly she had never wanted mem to be distinguished like two figures of romance. Why as it then that they chafed and irritated her by a hundred ean invisible little trifles, by continual indefinable grossness, their very country nature, by what they said, by their stures, even by their merriment?

She recalled her own mother, of whom she never spoke to living soul, a governess educated at Saint-Denis, seduced, ad of misery and grief when Madeleine was twelve. An known stranger had made himself responsible for the little rl's upbringing. Her father doubtless. Who was he? She d no exact knowledge, though she might have dim suspims.

The lunch went interminably on. Customers began to ekle in now, shaking hands with Father Duroy, exclaiming the sight of his son, looking covertly at his wife with sly

"Sacré mâtin! He's got hold of a lovely piece for wife, has Georges Duroy."

Others, less intimate, sat down at the wooden tables, raspi out: A pint!—A chop!—Two beers!—A rum! They began play domino, noisily rattling the little wooden discs.

Mother Duroy was coming and going ceaselessly, ser the customers in her cheerless way, taking the money, wint the tables with the corner of her blue apron.

The smoke of clay pipes and farthing cigars began to the room. Madeleine started coughing and asked: "Shall go out? I can't stand this."

Old Duroy didn't like the suggestion; lunch was not or At length Madeleine got up and left them, sitting on a chi on the road-side by the door and waited till her father-inand husband had finished their coffee and brandies.

Georges rejoined her presently: "Would you like a row the river?" he asked her.

She assented joyfully: "Oh! yes, do let us."

They walked down the mountainside and hired a boat Croisset, passing the rest of the afternoon alongside a t islet under the willows, both dozing in the soft spring lulled by the little wavelets of the river. They returned nightfall.

The evening meal by the light of a candle was even me depressing to Madeleine than the morning one. Father Du who was half tipsy, hardly spoke at all. The mother ma tained her gloomy reserve.

The miserable light threw on the grey walls shadows heads with enormous noses and outlandish gestures. Sor times one saw a giant hand raise a fork the size of a gard rake towards a mouth which opened like a monster's jav when any of them turning round a little presented a prof to the yellow flickering flame.

Dinner was over at last, and Madeleine pulled her husbal outside, not to stay a minute longer in the dismal room w its perpetual foul smell of old pipes and spilled liquor.

"It's boring you already. Isn't it?" he asked her, as so as they were outside. She tried to deny it: "No." He insist T've noticed it. Say the word and we'll leave to-morrow." She murmured: "Yes. I would like to."

Everything was very still. It was a warm night and as the ep caressing shadows fell, it seemed full of faint sounds, tlings, whispers. They had come to a narrow forest path, der very tall trees between two impenetrably black coppiess. "Where are we?" she asked.

"In the forest."

"Is it big?"

"Very. The largest in France, they say."

The smell of earth, trees, moss, all the freshness and decay the thick forest made up of shooting buds and stagnant reds, of green verdure and mouldy jungle seemed to dwell here.

Raising her head, Madeleine saw the hosts of stars above the tops and although no breeze stirred the branches, she It around her the weird fluttering of an ocean of leaves.

A strange shiver passed through her mind and agitated her dy: vague anguish wrung her heart. Why? She could not iderstand it. But it seemed to her that she was lost, overhelmed, set in the midst of fearful danger, abandoned by solitary, alone in the world, buried in this living tomb. membling, shaking everywhere.

She murmured: "I'm a little frightened. I would like to back."

"All right. Let's go."

"And ... shall we return to Paris to-morrow?"

"Yes, to-morrow."

"To-morrow morning?"

"To-morrow morning, if you like."

They went back. The old people had gone to bed. She ot badly, disturbed all night by the noises, new to her, of he countryside, the strident screams of the screech owls, the funting of a pig in its shed against the wall, a cock starting is crowing from mid-night.

She was up and ready to leave at the first flush of dawn. When Georges told his parents they were leaving, they sat till, and then both of them understood from whom the decision had emanated.

The father asked simply: "Shall I be seeing you again!" "Yes, of course. During the summer."

"That's all right then."

The old woman growled: "I only hope you won't me what you have done."

Going down the hill, Duroy began laughing.

"Well," he said, "I warned you. I had no desire to in duce you to Monsieur and Madame du Roy de Cantel, fa and mother."

She laughed too, and answered: "I am delighted to be seen them. They are good souls and I shall often think them in the whirl of Paris. I have begun to love them."

She added pensively: "Du Roy de Cantel...You'll that no one will be surprised at our visiting eards. We settle everyone we have passed a week on your parents' estated drawing close to him she breathed a kiss on his che "Happy days, Geo."

His arm went round her. "Happy days, Made."

Far below, down in the valley they saw the silver rib of the river rolling along under the morning sun, the fact chimneys belching their black clouds into the sky and all sharp steeples standing sentinel over the ancient city.

CHAPTER II

For Roys had been back in Paris two days and the journahad resumed his old post temporarily, prior to giving up the 78 service and definitely taking over Forestier's responsibi-88 and devoting himself exclusively to the political side. That evening he light-heartedly ran up the stairs of his decessor's flat to take his wife in his arms. He was cheerby submitting to her physical allure and quiet, almost perceptible, domination. Passing a florist's at the end of the 78-Dame-de-Lorette, he thought of buying Madeleine a quet and took a large bunch of lovely fresh roses just soming, a cluster of perfumed buds.

t every floor on the staircase he gave a complacent glance imself in the glass, that mirror which invariably brought k to his mind his first visit to the house.

le rang the bell, having forgotten his key, and the same ment opened the door whom he had kept on, on his wife's ice.

Madame has returned?"

Yes, Monsieur."

the dining room he was surprised to see three covers, and the drawing room curtain being raised he saw leleine arranging in a vase on the mantel-shelf a bunch uses the exact duplicate of his own. He was exasperated aggrieved, as if someone had stolen his idea, his complitant all the happiness he expected from it.

oming in, he asked: "You've invited someone?"

he went on arranging the flowers and answered without inground. "Yes and no. It's my old friend the Count de drec. He generally dines here on Mondays and is coming sual."

eorges mumbled: "I see."

e was standing behind her, his bouquet in his hand, with desire to hide it, to throw it away. But all he said was: lok I've brought you some roses." She turned round quickly, full of smiles.

"Ah! How sweet of you to have thought of it," and held out her arms to him offering her lips with such assumed delight that he felt himself mollified at once.

She took the flowers and breathed in their perfume, is with the brightness of a pleased child, put them in the of empty vase facing the first one. She examined the effect murmured:

"There! I'm satisfied. Now I have my mantelpiece proper adorned.''

Presently she added with an air of conviction:

"You know, he's a charming man, Vaudree, you will friends at once."

A ring announced the count. He came in, tranquil, when much at his ease, like one in his own home. After gallar kissing the young woman's fingers he turned and cords shook hands with her husband: "I hope you are well, dear du Roy."

He had no longer that formal manner, that stiff reser but was pleasantly affable as if he realized that the post was no longer the same. The journalist, surprised at change, went out of his way to reciprocate his advances. As five minutes one would have thought that they had known admired one another for ten years.

Madeleine's face was radiant. She said: "I'm going to be you together. I must have a look in my kitchen," and left the room, followed by the looks of both men.

When she returned she found them discussing the the and the latest play with lively harmony and a unity of a look which was speedily developing into friendship.

It was a delightful dinner, intimate and homely, and count prolonged his stay, feeling himself welcome in this har new household.

After his departure, Madeleine said to her husband:

"Isn't he just perfect? And he's so celebrated. Above a real friend, reliable, devoted, faithful. Ah! without him. She didn't pursue this train of thought and Georges repli "Yes, I find him very decent. I think we shall get on " ell together."

She went on briskly: "You won't like it but there's work be done before we go to bed. I didn't have time to tell n about it before dinner because Vaudrec came too early. t I've been told some grave news, very grave indeed, news m Morocco. I got it from Laroche-Mathieu the deputy d minister-to-be. We shall have to make a first class article t of it, one that will cause a sensation. I've got all the We'll settle down to it now. Come on, ts and figures. te the lamp."

He obeyed her and they went into the study.

The same books lined the shelves of the bookcase, on the of which now reposed the three vases bought by Forestier Saint Juan on the eve of his last day on earth. Under the le the dead man's foot-warmer awaited the feet of du Roy o, sitting down took up the same ivory penholder, a little yed at the end of his predecessor's nibbling at it. Madeleine 1ed against the chimney-piece and, lighting a cigarette, I him her news and then expatiated on it with her ideas the scheme of the kind of article she wanted, le listened attentively, jotting down notes, and when she finished, advanced his own ideas, went over the whole ter again, exaggerated here and there and developed what no longer the mere plan of an article but an actual plan ampaign against the minister himself. This attack was to he beginning.

er cigarette went out, she was so interested, her keen mind ing ahead and roaming far and wide following and meing beyond Georges' idea.

com time to time she commented: "Yes...yes...that's first

...excellent...that's very effective."

t the end of it she said: "Now, let's get it written."

at he was baffled as usual and groped for words in vain. came across softly and leaning over his shoulder began to per phrases and sentences into his ear.

s that exactly what you intend to say?" she would ask he would answer: "Yes, the very thing."

e possessed a biting sarcastic wit, a malignant feminine irony which assailed the unfortunate statesman not only policially but personally, and she drove the attack home with dry humour which would raise a laugh of ridicule while the same time impressing the reader with its truth.

Du Roy put in an occasional line or two of his own whi had the effect of making the attack more weighty and a superficial. He had the knack of sly suggestion, of false in nuendo, developed by sharpening up his news items, and whi Madeleine stated anything to him as a fact which appeared him doubtful or libellous, he excelled in hinting at it, in way which would impress the mind more powerfully than he had actually asserted it.

The article finished, Georges read it over aloud. Be considered it very powerful and they beamed on one anothed delighted and surprised at this self-revelation the one to to other. Their eyes met full of admiration and hope, and they embraced, this intellectual ardour became a physical of the control of t

Du Roy took up the lamp again. "And now, darling?" asked, his eyes bright; and she answered: "Lead on, i master, since you are lighting the way."

He led the way into their room and she followed him ticklinks neck with the tips of her fingers to make him hur between the collar and his hair. It was a little trick of he this particular tickling and he could never stay still under

The article appeared over the signature of Georges du Rede Cantel and created a tremendous sensation. It was ferred to in the Chamber. 'Daddy' Walter congratulate the author and made him political editor of the Vie Françaishis old post reverting to Boisrenard. Then began in the paper a skilful violent campaign against the Minister for Foreit Affairs. The attack, invariably circumstantial and support by facts, sometimes ironic, sometimes serious, broadly conoccasionally but usually maliciously venomous, struck with deadly sureness which surprised everyone. Rival papers began to quote the Vic Française, extracting whole pagraphs, and those impower were inquiring whether they congag this unknown implacable foe, with the bribe of prefecture.

On Roy was becoming famous in political circles. He sensed growing importance in conciliatory gestures, hand-ikings, doffed hats; and, more and more his wife filled him that wondering admiration at her ingenuity and resourcefuls, the uncanny skill with which she ferreted out information and the number of her acquaintances.

At any moment he would find in his drawing room, a senator, leputy, a judge or a general and they all treated Madeleine th solemn familiarity. "Where had she met all these ple?" "Socially," she told him. "But how had she maged to capture their confidence, trust and affection?"

could not fathom it.

She would make a first class diplomat," he thought.
Often she came in late for meals, out of breath, flushed, mbling, and without waiting to lift her veil would burst twith: "I've got a scoop for to-morrow. What d'you think, Minister of Justice has appointed two judges who were object in the mixed commission scandal! We're going to mch a barrage on them they'll remember."

And they would launch their barrage on the minister d follow it up day after day. Laroche-Mathieu, the puty who dined with them on Tuesdays, after they had begun week with the Count de Vaudree, would shake hands vigorsly with them both, spluttering with delight. "Good God!" would proclaim, "what a show-down! After this we can't p winning." He had been angling after the portfolio of reign Affairs and now saw himself getting it.

This man Laroche-Mathieu was a political Mr. Facing-bothys, a provincial solicitor, impecunious, with no convictions, courage, no principles and no brains, a small town boss, by sitting on the fence midway between the two extremes, ort of political Jesuit, of shady character, one of those demonstrate mushrooms who spring up by the hundred on the popular ngheap of universal suffrage.

His native village cunning enabled him to pass for a strong in amongst his colleagues, that collection of riff-raff, outlers and failures from whom we select our members of parliaent. He was just sharp enough, cautious enough, familiar enough, pleasant enough, to get on. In short, Laroche-Mathi was working his way up in the world, the mixed, dirty, hi stupid world of political big wigs.

Everyone was saying of him "Laroche will be a minister and no one believed more enthusiastically that Laroche won be a minister than that same Laroche.

He was one of the principal share-holders in Daddy Walls paper and his colleague and partner in many a financial del

Du Roy supported him confidently and with indefinite hor for himself in the future. In doing this he was only carry on the work which Forestier had begun. Laroche Matti had promised Forestier to get him the Cross of the Legion Honour when his own hour of triumph sounded. The deep tion now would adorn the breast of Madeleine's new husha That was all. Nothing was changed.

It was, indeed, so obvious that this was so, that his college on the paper began to take it up in a way that intensely in tated him.

Nowadays they addressed him only as Forestier.

As soon as he came into the office someone would call a "Good morning, Forestier." He would pretend not to hear a would sort out his letters. But the voice would pipe out as more loudly: "How goes it Forestier?"

As du Roy made for the Director's sanctum, the man m had spoken would stop him, with some such remark as: "(sorry; it's you I want to speak to. So stupid of me, but] always mixing you up with poor Charles. It's because you articles are so exactly like his were. All of us get mudd by it."

Du Roy rarely answered but he fumed inwardly; and a sul anger was bred within him against the dead man

Even Daddy Walter himself had proclaimed that every was amazed at the identical qualities of style and inspirat which characterized the contributions of the new politi editor, compared with those of his predecessor. would say, "it is Forestier himself, but a better informed, m virile Forestier."

Another time, happening to open the cupboard in which boquets were kept du Roy found those belonging to his edecessor with crêpe bands round their handles while his m, which he had used when he was working under Sainttin, were adorned with pink favours. They had all been set ton the same shelf according to size and a placard, such as sees in museums, had been inscribed on it. "Ancient collector. Forestier and Co. Successor, Forestier-du Roy. Everlasty Articles. Useful in any conditions." He calmly shut the ploard saying foudly: "There are idiots and jealous cads grywhere."

But his pride was hurt, and his vanity, that suspicious vanity, it readiness to take offence which is the heritage of the grary man from the most junior reporter to the greatest et.

That word Forestier lacerated his ear; he dreaded hearing and felt himself reddening when he did. The name was a ter jest to him, more than that, almost an insult. It cried ad to him: "It is your wife who does the work, just as she I the other man's. Without her you would be nothing." He acknowledged freely that Forestier had been nothing thout Madeleine; but surely it couldn't be true of himself well!

At home, the obsession persisted. Now the whole house alled the dead man, the furniture, nick-nacks, everything touched. He had never given a thought to it before. But joke played on him by his cofleagues had become a sore, tering in his mind, fed and nurtured by a host of trifles, herto unnoticed.

He could no longer touch any article without the immediate ling that he saw Charles' hand on it. Looking around him saw not a thing that the other man had not purchased, d, cherished, owned. More than all this Georges began to and worry about the former relationship between his and and his wife.

Iten he was himself astonished at this mental turmoil and ld not understand it. He asked himself: "What the devil me? I'm, not jealous of Madeleine's friends. I don't rry myself at anything she does. She comes and goes just as she likes. Yet the mere recollection of that brute Cha infuriates me."

Ceaselessly he told himself: "How such a woman on have tolerated an animal like him for a single moment pa my comprehension."

His sour rancour increased day by day, magnified by the like pin-pricks, by the constant thought of the dead man at a talk with Madeleine, a word with the servant, or even chambermaid. Du Roy was fond of sweet dishes and evening he asked: "Why don't we have any sweets? You ne put them on."

The young woman answered equably: "You're quite rie

I don't think of it. Charles disliked them..."

He banged his fist on the table with uncontrollable exasse tion.

"So that's it! D'you know Charles is getting on my ners It's Charles here, Charles there, Charles everywhere. Char would like this, Charles loved that. Can't you let him re Surely he's dead enough!"

Madeleine looked at him, quite taken aback. understand such an outburst. Then, with her quick in ligence she guessed what was passing through his mind slow work of posthumous jealousy, swollen every second everything that recalled the other man. She thought it rat childish of him but she was flattered by it and made no re-

He longed to get rid of this jealousy he could not cone But the same evening it broke out again. They were work on an article after dinner and his foot got entangled in foot-warmer. He kicked it aside impatiently saying h jokingly:

"Did Charles always have cold feet?"

She answered pleasantly: "Oh! he lived in terror of col

He had a weak chest you know."

Du Roy replied cruelly: "By Gad, he proved that re enough," and then added gallantly, kissing her hand, "happened by the state of the for me."

He couldn't keep off the subject. That night in bell found himself asking: "Did Charles wear night caps to ke t the cold?"

She took it as a joke and answered: "Not a night cap, only warm band round the temples."

Georges shrugged his shoulders saying with the air of a ter man:

What a weakling!"

From that time Charles was mixed up in his conversation atimally; it was an obsession. He couldn't help himself; dhe always referred to him as "that poor Charles" with adescending pity.

Back in the office where, two or three times every day, he ard himself being referred to as "Forestier" he avenged nself by following the dead man with spiteful mockery into tomb. He recalled his faults, his follies, his little weak-ses, going over them complacently one by one, developing d enlarging them as if he had to struggle in his wife's art against a formidable rival.

Several times he asked her: "Tell me, Madeleine, do you nember that time when that fat gherkin of a Forestier tried prove to us that stout men were more virile than thin

3S ?' '

Then he wanted her to tell him a host of intimate secret rital details about the dead man and when Madeleine, strained and uncomfortable, refused to answer he obstitely persisted.

"Come, do tell me. He must have been a comical sight in ments like that."

Ill at ease she murmured: "Come now Georges, stop it. Be iet. Those days are finished now."

But he would not: "No, tell me! I'll swear he must have m a clumsy lout in bed, that animal!"

And he always finished with the remark: "What a pig he s."

One evening towards the end of June he was smoking a sarette at the open window and the overpowering heat ggested a drive.

"My little Made," he asked her, "shall we take a turn as as the Bois?"

She agreed and they took an open cab through the Champ Elysées and down the avenue of the Bois-de-Boulogne. was a still night, one of those stifling evenings when enervating air of Paris chokes the lungs like fumes from furnace. An army of vehicles carried countless lovers to g shelter of the trees, one cab behind the other, an end

Georges and Madeleine amused themselves looking at the innumerable couples, all arm in arm, the women in brid array, the men in sober garb, a vast river of lovers flown towards the Bois under the scorehing starry sky. There not a sound but the monotonous rattle of wheels on the re-Interminably they passed and passed, two occupants to eve carriage, sprawled back on the cushions, silent, hugging de to each other, lost in a maze of desire, trembling with anticip tion of consummation to be. The warm shadows seemed in of kisses. A feeling of wafted sensuousness, of animal h was everywhere, making the air heavy and suffocating. these yoked couples intoxicated with the same thought, same heat, filled the atmosphere around them with fever; carriages, charged with love, over which caresses seemed hover, breathed out, on their way, a kind of sensual, subt distracting whisper.

The contagion of it all began to affect Georges at Madeleine. Without a word spoken, their hands met soft They were both a little oppressed by the stifling heat and the all-prevading languor.

At the turning by the fortifications they instinctively turn to one another in close embrace and Madeleine, not as sel possessed as usual, murmured rather confusedly: "We a just the same pair of madeaps that we were in Rouen."

"Oh! my little Made," he answered, and pressed her to him She said: "Do you remember the forest at your home, he sinister it was? It seemed full of frightful beasts to me a to have no end. But here it's lovely. One feels kisses the air and I know that Sevres is on the other side of

He answered: "Oh! in my home forest there are only dear ixes, hares, a few wild boar, with, here and there, a forester's

That word, the name of the dead man, shocked him as powerily as if someone had shouted it from the depths of the od. It numbed him and he was again in the grip of that range persistent obsession, that jealous gnawing unconquerble anger which had been marring his recent life. After a ause he asked: "Did you often come here in the evenings fith Charles?"

"Oh yes, very often."

Quite suddenly, he felt he must go home, an urgent, imperaive, depressed desire. But the image of Forestier had entered is mind again, possessing it, monopolizing it, so that he could either think nor speak of anything but him.

With malicious accent he questioned her.

"Tell me something, Made?"

"What, dear."

"Were you ever unfaithful to poor Charles?"
She answered disdainfully: "You are becoming objectionble and vulgar."

But he would not leave the subject.

"Now, come my little Made, you may as well be frank. Iwn up. You were unfaithful to him. You did make a cuck-bd of him, didn't you?"

She was silent, disgusted as all women are by that word. Obstinately he persisted: "Sacristi, if anyone was made for that part he was. Oh! yes. Oh! yes. It would amuse me like anything to know if he was a cuckold. God! what a cod's head he was!"

He saw that she was smiling now, at some remembrance terhaps.

"Come on, tell me. What does it matter anyway? It would be really funny to own to me, that you deceived him, to admit it to me."

He was actually trembling with the hope and desire Charles, the odious Charles, the detestable dead moveursed corpse should have undergone this shameful tion. And besides...besides another emotion more was stimulating his desire to find out.

"Made, my little Made, I beg you, do please tell me one would blame you; you would have been a fool no Now, come, own up."

There was no doubt this insistence was amusing her She was laughing; sharp staccato merry little laughs,

He brought his lips quite close to her ear: "Come...Com admit it."

She drew away with an irritated movement and answ sharply:

"How stupid you are! Does one reply to questions of kind?"

She had said this in such a peculiar tone that a cold sh ran through her husband. He sat aghast, stricken, breath as one who has sustained an overwhelming moral shock.

They were driving by the side of the lake now, on w the sky seemed to have shed its stars. Two swans were glit slowly along, hardly visible in the dusk. Georges called to the coachman: "Go back," and the carriage turned ro crossing the others whose huge lamps shone like eyes in night of the Bois.

"Why had she spoken in that strange manner?" he as himself. "Was it an admission?" and the practical certain that she had deceived her first husband, filled her present with rage. He wanted to beat her, to tear her hair out, strangle her.

If only she had answered: "Dearest, don't you know that I had wanted to betray him, it would have been with yout I would have done it?" How he would have taken her to arms, loved her, worshipped her!

He sat quite still, eyes to the sky, arms crossed, his mind shocked even to think. All he could feel was that rancour, t fury fermenting and growing within him that devours hearts of all males made victims to the vagaries of femin lust. For the first time he was undergoing the poigna confused agony of the husband who suspects! He was jealo yes jealous on a dead man's behalf, jealous for Foresti Jealous in a weird, hurt fashion, into which suddenly hat vainst Madeleine began to enter.

Then, by slow degrees, an artificial calm took its place and rusting his grief aside he thought: "All women are the me. One must make use of them and never give them any-ing of oneself."

The bitter sorrow in his heart mounted to his lips in words malice and disgust. But he didn't let a single one escape. le kept muttering to himself: "The world is to the strong.

must be strong. That's the one vital thing."

The carriage put on speed. They were passing the fortifitions again. Du Roy saw before him the red glow in the y like the flames of a huge forge; and he heard a confused, st, continual roar made up of numberless different sounds, dull volume of noise near and afar off, the whisper of Paris eathing, on this summer night, like a Colossus weary with bour.

Georges reflected: "I should be a fool to make myself ill er this. Each for himself. Victory goes to the bold. otism is life; life is egotism. And egotism for fame and rtune is worth more than egotism for wife and love."

The Arc de Triomphe de l'Étoile sprang into view at the y's entrance, on its two monstrous legs, like a clumsy giant out to start walking down the wide open avenue before it. Georges and Madeleine found themselves once again in one of long line of carriages, bringing home, to the longed for I, the eternal couple, silent and interlocked; it seemed as the whole human race was gliding alongside bemused with , love and goodwill.

The young wife who had guessed something of what was ssing through her husband's mind said to him gently: What are you dreaming about dear? For half-an-hour you ren't spoken a word."

It laughed and answered: "I was thinking of all these ldling imbeciles and saying to myself that there are other ngs to do in life."

the murmured: "Yes...but it's nice sometimes...it's e...nice...when one has nothing better to do."

Heorges' thoughts were a medley of spiteful rage, stripping life of its cloak of poesy:

BEL-AMI

"I should be a fool to let all this worry me, to let it deprime of amything, to put myself out, plague myself, work mysup as I have been doing for some time." The vision Forestier crossed his mind now without raising any exaspetion. It seemed to him as though they had become record and made friends again. He felt like crying out "Good hold chap."

Madeleine was bored by his silence. She said: "Shall; have an ice at Tortoni's before we go in?"

He looked at her from his corner. Her beautiful bloprofile showed clearly against the bright light of a chautant. He reflected: "Yes, she is lovely. That's fine, a good cat a good rat, my connade. But the next time torment myself on your account it will be hot at the No Pole." Then he added aloud: "Certainly my darling," at so that she should guess nothing, he kissed her.

It seemed to Madeleine that her husband's lips were like But she gave him her usual smile as she took his hand alight.

CHAPTER III

reaching the office the next morning du Roy sought out isrenard. "My dear friend," said he, "I want your assisted again. For some time past it has been thought witty call me Forestier. I begin to find this a bore. Will you ve the goodness to inform our colleagues, that I will knock wn the next one of them that includes in this little joke. It The for them to consider whether their hobby is worth the fee of a duel. I am putting the matter in your hands sause you are a level-headed fellow who can stop it before goes to extremes and also because you were my second in other affair."

Boisrenard undertook the mission.

by Roy went out on his assignments, returning an hour ter. .

Not a soul called him Forestier.

Returning home he heard women's voices in the drawing om. He asked who was there and the maid replied: "Mine alter and Mme de Marelle." His heart missed a beat, then told himself: "Now for it!" and opened the door.

Metilde was in a corner near the fireplace, caught by a mbeam from the window. It seemed to Georges that she entalittle pale when she saw him. After first greeting Mane falter with her two daughters at her side. like a couple of tries guarding her, he turned to his former mistress. She eve him her hand; he pressed it with meaning, as if saying: love you just the same." She returned the pressure.

He said: "I hope you've been well during the century that is slipped by since we last met."

She answered composedly: "Oh! yes, and you. Be! Ami?" hen turning to Madeleine she added. "You permit me to call m Bel-Ami still?"

"Certainly dear, I permit you whatever you want."

A hint of irony seemed hidden in the words.

Mme Walter was alluding to a party Jacques Rival was giving at his bachelor flat, a great fencing display at white ladies would assist; she was saying: "It will be so interesting But I am worried. We have no one to escort us, my husbawill be away."

Du Roy at once offered himself. She accepted. "We sh be very grateful, my daughters and 1."

He was looking at the younger of the two girls and thing: "She's not too bad, that little Suzanne, not at all bad"

She looked like a fragile blonde doll, very tiny but w formed, with graceful figure and hips, bright blue-grey ey very white smooth skin, charming, unaffected manners, and happy lively way with her, for all the world like one of the porcelain dolls one sees in the arms of children hardly tall than their toy.

The elder sister, Rose, was dull, heavy, insignificant, one those girls mobody notices, speaks to or remarks on.

The mother rose to go and turned to Georges: "I'm relyi on you for next Thursday at two o'clock;" and he answere "I shall be there, madame."

As soon as they had left Mme de Marelle rose too,

"Au revoir, Bel-Ami."

This time it was she who pressed his hand hard, and sheld it for a long time. The silent avowal affected him she felt a sudden yearning for this merry little Bohemian me cap; she was a good sort, he thought, and perhaps really low him.

"I'll go and see her to-morrow," he promised himself. Alone together Madeleine gave him an amused look a began to laugh; a frank hearty laugh.

''Do you realize that Mme Walter has fallen for you?"

"Nonsense;" he said incredulously.

"But, I'm telling you there's no doubt about it. She's be talking about you to me. She's most keen on you,—ou silly about it. She said she wished she could find thusbands like you for her daughters!... Fortunately, wher, matters of that kind don't count."

He couldn't make out her drift: "What d'you mean do count'?"

She answered with the conviction of a woman sure of her round: "Well, Mme Walter is one of those women you never ear a whisper of scandal about, not a syllable, never, never. he is absolutely inpregnable. Her husband,—well, you know hat he is. But she,...she is another proposition. She has ad to put up with a lot through marrying a Jew but she has emained faithful to him. She's a straight woman."

Du Roy was surprised: "But I always thought she was a

'ewess too."

"She? Not at all. She is the Lady Patron of all the batholic charities of la Madeleine. She was even married in hurch. I don't know whether he went through a formal aptism, or whether the Church closed its eyes to it."

Georges murmured reflectively: "Well, well...then...you nean she really has taken to me?"

"Positively and completely. If you were not already pooked I would have advised you to ask for the hand of... of Suzanne I s'pose; you wouldn't like Rose."

He answered tugging his moustache: "What about the nother? The rats haven't got at her yet."

Madeleine shrugged her shoulders impatiently.

"Tve told you about the mother, my little boy, and I know what I'm talking about. Anyway I'm mot afraid. Women lon't go wrong for the first time at her age. One has to begin earlier."

Georges was thinking: "If what she says is true...why I might have married Suzanne?..."

He dismissed the thought: "Bah!...it's rubbish...the father would never have accepted me."

None the less he determined, from now, to watch Mme Walter's attitude towards him carefully and see whether he ould turn it to his own advantage.

Directly after lunch the next afternoon he made for the rue de Verneuil. The same maid opened the door and in the familiar fashion of servants of the middle classes asked him: "Everything all right monsieur?" and he answered: "Yes, thank you, my child."

In the drawing room, a faulty hand was running over scales on the piano. It was Laurine. He thought she would lea into his arms; but she rose solemnly, greeted him with cen monious formality as she would have a great personage at then withdrew, tremendously dignified.

Her demeanour was so obviously that of offended woma hood that he was astounded. Her mother came in and I kissed her hands.

"How often you have been in my thoughts," he said

"And you in mine," was her answer. "My darling little, Clo, I love you."

"And, I love you."

"Have you...have you missed me at all?"

"Yes and no. It hurt me a lot at first but I soon under stood your reason and I told myself: Just wait. He will com back sooner or later!"

"I didn't dare come back. I didn't know how you woul receive me: I didn't dare but I wanted to all the time. I the way what's the matter with Laurine! She would hard speak to me and went out perfectly furious."

"I really don't know. We can't mention your name to be since your marriage. My candid opinion is she's jealous."

"Good Heavens!"

"It's a fact. She doesn't call you Bel-Ami any more: sl actually refers to you as M Forestier."

Du Roy flushed: then he drew near her.

"Kiss me."

She gave him her lips.

"Where shall we be able to meet?" he asked.

"Why...the rue de Constantinople, of course." "Ah!... The rooms have not been let then?"

"No...I have kept them on."

"Kept them on?"

"Yes, I felt that you would return."

A gust of proud happiness shook him. So she did love him truly, faithfully, deeply.

He whispered: "I adore you," then asked: "Your husband

-how is he?"

"Very well indeed. He's just spent a month here; he let he day before yesterday."

Du Roy laughed loudly: "That's very convenient."

She answered naïvely: "Yes, it's really quite nice. But he never in the way even when he's here. You know that?"

"That's true. I like him. He's a charming man."

"And you," she asked, "how do you like your new life?"

"Middling. My wife is a colleague, a partner."

"Nothing more?"

"Nothing more ... as regards love ... "

'I quite understand. All the same she is very lovely."

"Yes, but she doesn't bother me."

He drew nearer to her: "When shall we meet?"

"Well...to-morrow...if you want to."

"At what time? Two o'clock?"

"Yes, two o'clock."

He rose to go saying rather awkwardly:

"You know, I intend to take over the flat in the rue de lonstantinople myself. I must. It's not right that you hould go on paying for it."

It was she, now, who kissed his hands with an adoring esture, murmuring: "You shall do as you like. It's enough or me to know that I kept it on for our reunion," and du toy left, his heart glowing with satisfaction.

Passing a photographer's shop the portrait of a tall woman with large eyes reminded him of Mme Walter. 'It's very ke her," he thought, "and she really isn't at all unattractive. wonder I've never noticed that before. I'm quite keen on eeing what she will be like on Thursday."

He rubbed his hands together, striding along, filled with ecret joy, the joy of success in all its forms, the egotistical by of the astute man who succeeds, the subtle pleasure amprised of gratified vanity and satisfied desire that is inferred on us by the favours of women.

On Thursday he said to Madeleine: "You are not coming the Assault-at-Arms at Rival's?"

"Oh! no thanks. That sort of thing bores me rather. I shall to to the Chamber of Deputies."

Punctual to the exact minute, he called for Mme Walter in an open cab. Her appearance quite surprised him, she looke so young and pretty. She had on a bright frock, the lo corsage of which showed the rise and fall of her large breast Never before had she seemed so fresh and attractive. Wit her calm assured composed poise and a certain trange matronly allure, he judged her really desirable. There wa nothing daring or provocative in her conversation. the usual things about the usual subjects, was restrained and moderate, and her ideas were methodical, well ordered an full of common sense, as of one who disliked excess of an kind. Her daughter Suzanne, all in pink, looked like a exquisite Watteau miniature: her elder sister, like a gove ness in charge of this tiny ship of dainty girlhood.

A row of carriages was drawn up outside Rival's door. D

Roy gave his arm to Mme Walter and they went in.

The Assault was being given in aid of the orphans of the sixth ward of Paris under the patronage of all the wives senators and deputies having any connection with la P Francaise.

Mme Walter had promised to be present with her daughter but had refused the title of Lady Patron because she lent he name only to charities undertaken by the clergy not only because she was extremely devout but because her marriage to an Israelite, in her own opinion rendered an emphatic rel gious deportment the more necessary on her side,

Every edition of the journal for the past three weeks ha proclaimed:

"Our eminent colleague Jacques Rival has conceived th ingenious and generous idea for the benefit of the orphan of the sixth ward of Paris, of a grand Assault in the fin school of arms adjoining his house.

"The hostesses are Mmes Laloigne, Remontel, Rissolin, wive of the senators of that name and Mmes Laroche-Mathier Percerol and Firmin, wives of the well known deputies. collection will be taken during the interval and the amoun will be immediately handed to the mayor of the sixth war or his representative."

It was a first class advertisement which the astute journalist ed contrived for himself, and his own benefit.

Jacques Rival received arrivals at the entrance to his house which a buffet had been installed the expense of which was be deducted from the offertory. He pointed out with a jendly hand the little staircase by which they were to go down the cave where he had set up his fencing school and shoot-g gallery: "Below, ladies, below. The Assault will take ace underground."

He hurried forward at sight of his director's wife, then ook hands with du Roy: "Hello! Bel-Ami."

The other was surprised: "Who told you that"

Rival broke in with: "Mme Walter here present. She thinks e nickname very pretty."

Mme Walter blushed: "Yes, I admit that if I knew you atter, I too, like little Laurine would call you Bel-Ami. It its you very well." Du Roy laughed: "Well then Madame, ease do it."

Her eyes fell: "No, we don't know one another well ough," and he said softly: "Dare I hope that we shall later

Well see about that," she answered,

The way down to the cave was illuminated by gas light; id the sudden change from the clear light of day to the sllow glare had something dismal about it. A close earthy lour came up from below: a hot humid smell of damp mouldy alls dried for the occasion, mingled with feminine perfumes

Lubin, rose, iris and violet.

The whole cavern was lighted up by Venetian lanterns and is garlands, hidden in the leaves and foliage, which concealed e damp stone walls. The ceiling was hung with ferns, and e floor covered with leaves and flowers, the effect of the hole being quite pleasing. In the little recess at the back, as a platform for the fencers, equipped with chairs for the dges. In the cave itself, were chairs in rows of ten; it could ist about accommodate two hundred people; four hundred in accommodate data control in the chair accommodate was taken up by the ladies who came in, chattering ith a great rustling of silks, fanning themselves as if they were in a theatre. The packed audience was already finding the air uncomfortably stuffy. A wag called out from time f time: "Orange! lemonade! beer!"

Mme Walter and her daughters reached their seats in the first row, and du Roy having escorted them there was leaving

"I must leave you now, the seats are reserved for ladies,"

Mme Walter hesitated and then objected:

"Never mind that. I want you to stay. You can point ou the fencers to me. Look, if you sit on the edge of this sea you won't inconvenience anyone." She gazed at him win her large, soft eyes and insisted: "Now please do sit down. monsieur ...monsieur Bel-Ami. We really need you;" and h complied: "I obey...with pleasure, Madame."

Everyone admired the cave. Georges well remembered in He recalled the morning he had spent in it the day before hi duel, alone, facing a little white cardboard target which stared at him from the second cave like a huge formidable eye.

The voice of Jacques Rival proclaimed from the staircase:

"We're going to begin, ladies;" and six gentlemen climbed on to the platform and sat in the chairs reserved for the jury they were General de Reynoldi, president, a little man with a huge moustache; the painter Joséphin Roudet, a tall bald headed man with a long beard; Matthéo de Ujar. Simon Ramoncel, Pierre de Carvin, three young society striplings and Gaspard Merleon, a professional.

Two cards, one on each side of the cave, announced the names of the contestants.

The first bout was between two professionals, good second class men. Occasionally the word "Touche" was heard, and the gentlemen of the jury automatically inclined six expert heads The unskilled audience saw nothing but a couple of living marionettes jumping around and waving their arms, clums and vaguely ridiculous...

The first two were succeeded by M Planton and Carapin both professionals, one military, the other 21 M Planton was extraordinarily small and M Carapin extraordinarily fat. One thought that the first prick of a foil would flate this balloon like an elephant with skin of tissue paper. eryone was laughing. M Planton leaped about like a nkey. M Carapin moved only his arms, the rest of his dy being immobilized by fat: but with all his ponderosity managed to defend himself the full five minutes and the lges' verdict, a draw was popular.

After a contest between an amateur and a professional the t part of the programme concluded with an extremely fine ssage of arms between Jacques Rival and the celebrated bian professional Lebègue. Rival was the ladies' favourite. was a really first class athlete, well made, supple, agile and more graceful than any of those who had preceded him. fenced with stylish elegance, a complete contrast to the fled but more clumsy manner of his adversary. He was riously perfectly trained and in first class condition. He s awarded the decision and everyone agreed with it.

for some little time a strange commotion from the upper or had been disturbing the audience: a noisy stamping of t and loud laughter. The two hundred guests who had m crowded out of the cave were amusing themselves in their n way. On the little spiral staircase fifty men were crammed The heat was becoming unbearable below. The same ether. g was yelping in sharp staccato barks: "Orange! Lemonade! er.'

appeared, flushed and still wearing his fencing Rival tume.

'I'm going to fetch some refreshments," he said and made the staircase. But communication was cut with the upper r. He could as easily have pierced an exit through the ling as pass through the mass of humanity on the ground. lival shouted: "Pass along some ices for the ladies!" lifty voices took up the cry: "Ices!" Soon a tray appeared, it was empty the contents having been purloined on their у.

A powerful voice complained: "It's suffocating here, let's ish up and get away." Someone said: "The collection" and whole crowd, breathless but still cheerful, repeated: "The lection ... collection ... collection," and six ladies began to move along the rows of seats followed by the sound of silv falling into boxes. Du Roy pointed out to Mme Walter well known personalities. There were society men, journali belonging to great dailies, long established organs which look down on la Vie Française with a certain amount of contem They had seen so many of these politico-financial ventur offsprings of an unsavoury alliance, die, wiped out by collapse of a ministry. Painters and sculptors, sportsmen they generally are, were there too, a poet academician, t famous musicians and a couple of noble foreigners.

Someone hailed du Roy with "Good day to you, my frien It was the Count de Vaudrec. Excusing himself to the lad du Roy turned to him and shook hands; and coming back remarked: "He is a charming fellow, Vaudree; in his compa one feels breeding, ancestry."

Mme Walter made no reply. She was feeling a little th and her breast was rising and falling quickly with the eff of breathing. Du Roy's eye fell on it and occasionally he r her glance, an uneasy, faltering glance lighting on him a turning quickly away. He said to himself: "Well!...Well!

Well!...It looks as if I have lifted that prize too!"

The lady collectors finished their task, their boxes full gold and silver and a fresh placard was put on the sta announcing: "Grand Surprise." Two women appeared, fo in hand, dressed in black tights with very short kilts in covering a little of their thighs, their heads forcibly held hi by fencing pads. They were pretty and young and smil saucily in saluting the audience. Loud applause greeted the as they put themselves on guard amid gallant whispe chuckled jests and tolerant smiles on the lips of the judg This was the sort of display the public wanted and it gloat over, two fair combatants who inflamed the desire of the m and amongst the women awakened the natural inclination the Paris public towards any acquisition a trifle on the sugg tive side, any display verging on had taste, the falsely-witty a the pseudo-graceful. Every time either of the girls attacking bent forward stretching her limbs a thrill of pleasure r through the spectators. When one of them exposed a posteri them, a very ample posterior, mouths opened and eyes istened; at such moments it was not the wrist work they ere admiring. The applause was frantic.

A sabre duel followed but no one paid the least attention it, everyone wondering what was going on upstairs. For me minutes past there had been a tremendous elatter of oving furniture, being dragged along the floor as if it were household removal; then, suddenly they heard the sound of a ano and the noise of feet moving in rhythm. Those upstairs ad started a ball to make up for seeing nothing of the show flow.

A laugh rang through the audience in the school of arms, ien the ladies wanted to dance, and all interest in the fencing anished in a hubbub of conversation. The idea of the dance, approvised by the latecomers, caught on, and everyone wanted join them.

But two new combatants were saluting one another and these ill on guard with so much distinction and authority that the aning attention of the spectators was caught again; there was ich clastic grace, trained strength, perfect co-ordination between mind and muscle, such sureness and masterly technique at even the ignorant crowd was surprised and delighted. They ilt that they were being privileged to see something beautiful nd rare, that two great artists were showing them the very imit of what was possible in the way of craft, science, and hysical perfection. No one spoke now so concentrated was he attention. Then when they shook hands at the end there was a burst of real unaffected applause. Their names were world famous. They were Sergent and Ravignac.

Little by little the crowd went up the spiral staircase.

"One must drink anyhow," they said. Great was their krath when it was found that the gentry of the ball had ansacked the buffet. Not a cake, not a drop of champagne, not one soft drink, no beer, not a chocolate, not a sweet, no fruit remained, nothing, not a single eatable or a drink. The dancers had pillaged, ravaged and wiped off werything. Details were forthcoming from the servants whose laces, preternaturally solemn, concealed their desire to laugh.

The ladies had been even more rapacious than the men and had eaten and drunk themselves ill. It was as though the were listening to the tale of the sack of a city during at invasion, narrated by the survivors. There was nothing for it but to go home. The men were lamenting the twenty france they had contributed to the collection; and swore heartily a those up above who had not only gorged themselves but had had the privilege without paying for it. The lady patrons had collected more than three thousand francs. There remained after paying expenses, two hundred and twenty francs for the orphans of the sixth ward.

Escorting the Walter family home Georges sat facing his director's wife. Again he noticed that troubled, caressing, fleeting glance. "I really believe she's nibbling," he told himself and smiled at this second recent confirmation of his powers with women, for since the resumption of their relation ship Mme de Marelle had cast off all restraint and her passion for him was frenzied.

He went home with joyous steps.

Madeleine was waiting for him in the drawing room.

"I have news for you," she said. "The Morocco business has been muddled. France can't send a'n expeditionary force there for months. We are going to use this to turn out the ministry, and Laroche's opportunity has come for the portfolio of Foreign Affairs."

Du Roy, to vex his wife, pretended disbelief. It would be madness to revive the Tunis bungle.

She moved impatiently. "I tell you it's true! I tell you it's true! You don't understand that with these people it's only a matter of money. Nowadays, my dear, in political matters, 'cherchez la femme' is out of date. It's 'chercher

"Rubbish!" he said spitefully to annoy her. It did anno her and she replied exasperatedly: "Upon my word you are as dull and stupid as Forestier was."

She wanted to hurt and awaited an angry outburst, but he merely smiled and answered: "Really! As big a fool as that cuckold Forestier?"

The word shocked her. "Oh! Georges!" she murmured.

His manner was insolent and jeering: "What's the matter? ou admitted to me the other evening that you had been faithful to him, didn't you?" And he added: "Poor devil!"

a tone of profound pity.

Madeleine disdained any reply and turned her back on him; en after a short silence she went on: "We shall have a big owd here on Wednesday: Mme Laroche-Mathieu will dine ith us, with the Viscountess de Percemur. Will you ask val and Norbert de Varenne? I will see Mmes Walter and Marelle myself. Perhaps I'll invite Mme Rissolin too." For some time passed she had been wire-pulling, using her sband's political influence to draw to their house, more or so willingly the wives of senators and deputies who wanted the wire in la Vie Française.

Du Roy agreed to be responsible for Rival and Norbert. e grinned happily pleased that he had found an excellent ethod of annoying his wife and satisfying that obscure bitterss, that gnawing confused jealousy born in him on the eveng of their drive in the Bois. He never referred to Forestier

w without adding the word cuckold. He felt it would end infuriating Madeleine. And at least ten times during that rening he found opportunity, with pretended joviality, of entioning "that cuckold of a Forestier."

He no longer hated the dead man: he was avenging him. His wife appeared not to notice and sat opposite him, smilg, composed and indifferent.

The next day, while she was writing the invitation to Mme Jalter, he volunteered to deliver it, solely to secure an interiew with la Patronne alone and find out her feelings towards im.

At two o'clock he was ushered into her drawing room. Mme Valter appeared. She looked pleased as she extended her and.

"What happy breeze sends you here?"

"No good breeze except the wish to see you. Some power as drawn me to you. I don't know why, for I've really othing to say. I've come that's all. Forgive me for such an rly call and my blunt explanation." He spoke in gallant mi-playful tones, with a smile on his lips but with an under

She was taken aback and, blushing a little, faltered ut...really...l don't understand...you surprise me." He added: "It's a declaration, made in a joking way, becam lon't want to startle you." They were sitting close to one another. She was listen

th pleased interest. 'Then it's...something serious?"

'It is indeed. I've wanted to tell you for a long time, y long time, but I haven't dared. Everyone says you ar severe, so strict..."

she had recovered her self-possession and answered.

'Why have you picked on to-day?"

I don't know," he lowered his voice,—" perhaps becaus thought of nothing but you since yesterday."

he suddenly became pale. ... Come, enough of this childist

s. Let's talk about something else."

But he was now kneeling beside her and she was afraid tried to rise; but both his arms went round her, and ken seated. His voice became passionate. Yes, it's true. I love you-have done madly for ages

't speak. You are sending me mad. I tell you I low ... If you only knew how much!" She, breathless an t, tried to speak but could not articulate a word. Sh ned him off with both hands, gripped his hair to ward of approach of that mouth reaching for her own, twisted he I right and left, left and right frantically, shutting he not to see him.

is hands touched her over her dress, handled her, felt he she was swooning under the heavy brutal caress. He rose lenly and tried to clasp her to him but, free for just on ad, she escaped his grasp and fled from the room.

judged that pursuit would make him look ridiculous, so t himself collapse on a chair, his head in his hands, feign convulsive sobs. Then he pretended to pull himself her, cried. "Aideu, adieu!" and left.

In the hall he composedly took up his stick, and walked almly into the street, saying to himself: "Christ, I do believe e's caught;" then strolled into a telegraph office to send a little blue" to Clotilde, making an appointment for the errow.

Returning home at his usual time he asked his wife: "Is veryone turning up to your dinner party?"

"Yes, only Mme Walter is doubtful. She isn't sure. She toke of some sort of engagement, a matter of conscience. ouldn't make her out, she seemed quite peculiar. Anyway. t's hope she'll come after all."

He shrugged his shoulders: "She'll come, right enough." None the less, he was by no means certain, and was remark-bly uneasy till the day of the dinner, when Madeleine received short note from la Patronne: "After a lot of trouble I have anaged to be free for this evening and shall be with you. Iv husband cannot accompany me."

Du Roy thought: "I was wise not to call again. Now she's almed down. Let's see what happens."

But he waited her arrival with some anxiety; and when she preared, calm, rather cold and distant, he made himself very umble, very discreet, and submissive.

Mmes Laroche-Mathieu and Rissolin were accompanied by heir husbands. The Viscountess de Percemur represented high ociety. Mme de Marelle looked ravishing in an amazingly entastic yellow and black creation, a Spanish costume which t off well her trim form, fine figure, rounded arms, and little irdlike head.

Du Roy had on his right Mme Walter and, during dinner, alked to her on serious subjects with marked respect. Occaionally he glanced at Clotilde. "She grows prettier and resher every day," he thought. Then his eyes wandered gwards his wife. She was looking beautiful, which renewed within him his sullen bitter resentful anger.

La Patronne wanted to leave early. "I will see you home," esaid. She refused. He insisted. "Why won't you let me? Tou are hurting me. Don't let me feel that you have not orgiven me. See how calm I am."

"You can't leave your guests like that."

He smiled: "Of course I can. I shan't be away twen minutes. No one will notice it even. If you refuse you wi really hurt me."

"Very well, you may come."

The moment they were in the carriage he caught her han and kissed it passionately.

"I love you, I love you. Don't stop me saying it. I'm n going to touch you. I want only to say the words, I love you She reproached him: "Oh! after all you promised me!

is very wrong of you, very wicked."

He made an assumed effort and then went on in a controll voice: "I'm myself now, you can see.... But let me just st inside your house for five minutes, only to kneel at your fe and say those three words and look into your adorable face

She had left her hand in his, and answered in halting tone "No! I can't. I don't want to. Think what the servar would say, and my daughters. No, no, no, it is out of t question."

"But I can't live without seeing you. Besides it need r be in your house. I must see you if it's only for one mint every day, just to touch your hand, to breathe the perfum air around you, to gaze on the beauty of your form, and yo lovely great eyes which bewitch me."

It was banal enough, this song of love. But hackney commonplace, vulgar though it was she was drinking it all like music and was actually trembling.

"No, no...it is impossible...be quiet...I mustn't listely He lowered his voice, whispering into her ear, realizing the this simple soul must be captured by slow stages, that he would have to persuade her to grant him a meeting somewhere, at place of her choice at first, and afterwards his.

"Listen...I must...I will see you...I will wait before yo door...like a beggar...if you don't come down, I will co up...but see you I will...I will...to-morrow."

"'No, no! You are not to come. I will not receive you Think of my daughters."

"Then tell me where I can meet you...in the street...ar there...any time...if I can only see you...I shall greet on...just say 'I love you' and I shall be gone."

She hesitated and was lost. As the carriage drew up at her nor, she whispered hurriedly: "I will be in the Church of le Trinity at half past three to-morrow afternoon."

When he got back his wife asked him: "Where have you een all this time?" And he answered in a low voice: "I had

1 go to the Post office to wire off something urgent."

Mme de Marelle came across to them. "You can take me ome. Bel-Ami. That was the condition I made when I came:" nd turning to Madeleine: "You're sure you're not jealous." Mme du Roy answered slowly: "No, not excessively."

The guests left. Mme Laroche-Mathieu looked like a little rovincial nursery maid. She was a notary's daughter and aroche had married her when he was a struggling solicitor. fme Rissolin, old and overdressed, was like a retired midwife. he Viscountess de Percemur looked down on all of them. Her bby white paw touched their plebeian hands with repugance. Clotilde, a filmy cloud of lace, remarked to Madeleine the door: "Your dinner party was perfect. You will soon keeping the first political salon in Paris."

Alone with Georges she drew him to her arms: "Oh! my arling Bel-Ami, I love you more every day."

The cab rumbled them off, rolling like a ship at sea. "It's not so nice in here as in our room," she said.

"No" he answered...but his thoughts were with Mme Valter.

CHAPTER IV

Trinity Square was almost deserted under the blazing Jul Paris was overwhelmed by the sluggish heat, as if the dull heavy scorching air from above had collapsed on to the city below in an unnerving enervating mass.

The water from the fountains in front of the Church trickled feebly; it seemed too weary to flow and that in the pond, with its floating leaves and fragments of paper, was stagnant muddy green.

On the stone fountain edge was a solitary dog, stretched out in a vain attempt to cool himself by the water. A fee people sprawled on the seats, in the little garden facing the Church entrance, looked at the animal enviously.

Du Roy took out his watch. It was only three o'clock. H was half an hour early.

The thought of the rendezvous amused him and he chuckled Churches have various uses, he reflected. They can consol one for having married a Jew, confer an attitude of aloofned in the world of politics, an odour of sanctity in society and afford cover for clandestine meetings. One can use religio to one's own advantage, as one can everything else. If thing are set fair it is a walking stick, if too hot a sunshade, if stormy weather an umbrella, and when not wanted, can alway be left behind. That was what religion meant to her; and there were hundreds like her, who make a smug mockery of Almighty God, even use Him as a go-between, and would bitterly resent any criticism of their blasphemy. women who would be shocked at the idea of being taken to hotel, but who find it quite natural to conduct a love affai at the foot of the altar.

He walked slowly round the pond, then looked at the Church clock. Only five minutes had passed. He decided i would be more pleasant inside, and entered the Church.

It was refreshingly cool within, and, to make himself fami liar with the rendezvous, he strolled about the nave.

Another man was patrolling the great building and his gular steps, stopping now and again echoed du Roy's, a fat it held behind his back.

Here and there an aged woman knelt, face in hands.

A feeling of solitude, remoteness, rest, calmed the mind; e dim light through the stained glass windows soothed the es.

Du Roy returned to the west door and consulted his atch again. It was only fifteen minutes past three. He sat wn in the main aisle, regretting that he could not light a garette; all the time he heard the ceaseless promenade of e fat gentleman.

Some one entered. Georges turned round sharply. It was poor woman meanly clad. Near the first chair she fell on r knees and remained motionless, fingers locked, gazing upards, her spirit rapt in prayer.

Du Roy looked at her with interest wondering what sorrow, not grief, what despair had brought low that humble soul. or misery had broken her heart, that was obvious. Perhaps e had a brutal husband, a dying child it might be.

Mentally he murmured: "Poor wretches. Why must such ffering be?"

Anger mounted within him at nature's pitiless savagery, ien he reflected that these poor destitutes, at least, had the mfort of believing that Someone pitied them from on high id that their human lot was being inscribed in the registers. Heaven with all the balance in their favour in the debit id credit account. On high—where else, if not there?

And du Roy pondering great thoughts in the silence of the much passed his judgment on creation: "What a complete addle it all is!"

The rustle of a dress roused him. He rose quickly and went wards her. She did not offer her hand and murmured in a w voice: "I've only a few minutes. I must go back. Kneel wn close to me, so as not to draw anyone's attention to us." She led the way down the great nave looking for a suitably cluded place, clearly very familiar with the building. Her face was concealed behind a thick veil, and she walked softly that she could hardly be heard.

Near the choir, she turned round, and said in that mysteri ous undertone that we reserve for churches: "The transent will be better. We are too exposed here." She bowed to the High Altar deeply and genuflected, turned to the right, canback a little towards the entrance and, finally making up her mind, knelt down at a prie-Dieu.

Georges took possession of the neighbouring prie-Dieu and there they were in the attitude of prayer.

"Thanks. Thanks," he said: "I adore you. I want to say it over and over again, to tell you how I first began to love you, how I was conquered the very first time I saw you. One day you must let me open my heart and tell you it all

She was listening to him in an attitude of prayerful medita tion as if she heard nothing. She answered through her fin gers: "I am mad to allow you to speak to me like this, mad to have come here at all, mad to do what I am doing, mad to lead you to believe that this...this adventure can com to anything. Forget it all. You must. And never speak to me of it again."

She waited. He sought for a reply, decisive, passionate phrases, but could not suit the appropriate gestures to the words, in his awkward position. He said: "I expect nothing I hope for nothing. I love you. Whatever you do I shall repeat that to you, so often and with such strength and passion that in the end you will believe me. My love shall enter your heart and mind, word by word, hour by hour, day by day, till at last it will fill you like nectar, drop by drop, sweetening you, softening you, and, much later, forcing you at last to say: 'I love you too'."

He felt her breast heaving, her breath trembling by his side; suddenly she faltered: "I love you too."

He started as if one some one had struck him and gasped

"Oh! my God!"

She went on in stumbling accents: "Ought I to say such a thing to you? I feel myself guilty, shameless ... I... who have two young daughters...but I can't help myself...I can't help nyself...I can't help it...I would never have believed it... ever dreamed it possible...it is too much...too much for me. isten...listen...I have never loved before...only you... swear it . . . And you, I have loved for a year . . . in secret in my heart! Oh! How I have suffered and struggled ainst it... I can't any more. I love you...'

Tears were falling through her fingers, pressed to her face, nd her whole body trembled, shaken by the violence of her motion.

fleorges whispered: "Give me your hand, that I may touch press it."

She drew her hand slowly from her face. He saw her wet heeks and tears gathering in her eyes, ready to fall.

He had taken her hand and was fondling it: "Oh! that I night drink your tears."

Her low crushed voice was a moan.

"Don't take advantage of me...I am lost."

He stifled a smile. How could he take advantage of her that place? He pressed the hand he was clasping against his art and asked: "Can you feel it beating?"—For he had about chausted his stock of passionate phrases.

For some little time the regular footsteps of the solitary stroller had been drawing nearer them. He had finished his our of the altars and now, for the second time at least, was pproaching from the small transept on the right. When me Walter heard him, near their sheltering pillar, she natched her hand from Georges' clasp and covered her face gain. There they were two motionless figures, devoutly neeling, as if addressing heartfelt supplications to high eaven. The fat gentleman passed close, cast an indifferent lance at them and made for the west end of the Church, his at still firmly planted behind his back.

Du Roy who wanted a rendezvous somewhere other than finity Church whispered: "Where shall I see you to-orrow"

She gave no reply; she seemed inanimate, changed into a stue of Prayer. "To-morrow would you like to meet in onceau Park?"

She turned to him, her face uncovered. It was drawn wit suffering, anguished. Her voice was tremulous: "Leave me ...leave me now...go away...just for five minute...I suffer too much near you...I beg you...l can't...let me ask God to forgive me...to save me...leave me...fix minutes...."

Her face was so ravaged, so weebegone that he rose without word, hesitated, then asked: "May I return presently?"

A movement of her head gave assent, and he moved awa towards the choir. Then she tried to pray. She made superhuman effort to call upon (fod, her whole body vibrating and the lost soul within it. "Mercy!" she cried to heaven She shut her eyes with frenzy at not seeing the expecte visitant coming to her aid. She drove the thought of his from her, battled within herself against him, but, in place of the celestial apparition her sorrowful heart awaited, she say only the florid face of a young man.

For a whole year, every day and every night, she has struggled thus against this overpowering obsession, this image which haunted her dreams, which shrivelled her flesh are made her nights unbearable. She felt like a trapped animal ensnared, bound, thrown into the arms of the victorious main who had vanquished and overcome her and had done it with nothing but a handsome face and the colour of his eyes.

And now in this church, in God's near presence, she fe more feeble, more forsaken, more lost even than in her ow home. Already she was suffering by his absence. Yet st fought on even in her despair. She fought herself, appeale for help with all the strength of her soul. She would rathe have died than succumb in this way, she who had never falle She murmured desperate words of supplication; but hear only Georges' footfalls dwindling away into silence in the distance.

She realized that it was the end, that her struggle available her nothing. But she would not surrender. She became possessed by one of those mental storms which make wome east themselves shaking, screaming, contorted to the ground She was shivering violently in every limb, she knew she was ng to fall, tumbling in screeching convulsions amongst the irs. A quick step drew near. She turned her head. It ; a priest. She staggered up and ran to him holding out clasped hands and entreated him: "Oh! Save me! Save p" He pulled up surprised: "What is it you want, dame? '

I want you to save me. Have pity on me. If you don't o me I am lost."

He was a young man, tall with full, close shaved, dark eks, a fashionable city vicar of an opulent parish, well estomed to rich penitents.

Te looked at her wondering if she was mad; and answered:

That can I do for you?"

Receive my confession," she said, "and advise me, supt me, tell me what I must do."

Thear confessions on Saturdays at three o'clock and six." the grasped his arms and held them: "No! No! No! At once! once! You must. He is here now! In this church! He is ting for me!"

the priest demanded: "Who is waiting for you?"

A man ... who is going to ruin me, if you don't save me ... amot flee from him...I am too weak...so weak...so weak!" he sank to her knees moaning: "Oh! Have pity on me, my her! Save me, in God's name, save me!"

the caught hold of his black cassock so that he could not himself; he glanced uneasily round, wondering whether malicious or devout eye was watching this woman kneelat his feet. He saw that escape was impossible. "Get " he said, "I happen to have the key of the confessional h me;" and feeling in his pocket, he drew out a bunch of s, chose one and rapidly led her to one of the little boxes, se closets for the ordure of the soul in which the faithful ity their sins.

le entered the middle one and shut it after him and Mme lter, literally threw herself at the penitents' partition in a sion of frantic hope.

Bless me, my father, for I have sinned."

In Roy, after strolling round the choir made for the aisle on the left. In the middle he came upon the stout bald gen man still methodically patrolling with stolid measured tre and he asked what this oddity was doing there. The patro had come to a halt, looking at Georges, obviously wanting speak to him. When they were quite near one another said with great politeness: "Pardon, Monsieur, what per was this church built in?"

Du Roy replied: "Ma foi, I'm no authority; I should the it's about twenty years old or twenty-five perhaps. It's first time I've been in the place."

"I, too. I've never seen it before to-day."

The journalist's interest was roused.

"You seem to be examining it very thoroughly; you n have inspected every single detail."

The other replied resignedly: "I'm not viewing it at Monsieur. I'm simply waiting for my wife. She made appointment to meet me here and is very late."

He added after a second or two: "It's very hot, outside; Du Roy looked him up and down, sized him up as a gr natured simpleton, and suddenly funcied he resembled Fo tier.

"You are from the country?" he asked.

"Yes. From Rennes. And you, Monsieur, are you in church through curiosity?"

"No. I'm waiting for a lady too." And with a way the hand the journalist strolled on, a smile on his lips, the great west door he saw the poor woman again, still on knees praying fervently. "Christ," he muttered. "Sl be all day at it." He no longer pitied her or felt the l moved. He passed by her and quietly entered the right again to find Mme Walter. From a little way off he glan at the place where he had left her and was astonished no see her. At first he thought he had mistaken their shelter pillar and looked carefully round again. She had disappea He was amazed and furiously angry. Then it occurred to that she was looking for him and he went all over the chu She was not to be found, and he returned and sat down the chair she had occupied, hoping she would join him.

ere he waited. Presently he noticed the low murmur of ices. He had not seen a soul in that corner of the building. om where did this mumbling come then? He rose to find t and perceived in the lady chapel the doors of the confessual. The end of a dress protruded from one of them and is stretched along the floor. He went up and looked at it. It recognized it. She was confessing!....

He felt a violent desire to take her by the shoulders and ag her out of the confessional. Then he thought: "Bah! It's e cure's turn to-day; it will be mine to-morrow;" and sat mposedly down facing the little apertures, waiting his time d chuckling at the new development of the affair.

He had to wait long. At last Mme Walter rose from her lees, turned round, saw him and came over. Her face was ern and cold.

"Monsieur," she said, "I must ask you not to accompany e, not to follow me and not to come to my house alone. If u do, you will not be received. Adieu!" And she left him th frigid dignity.

He let her go, for his technique was never to force events. hen, as the priest emerged from his retreat he walked up to m and looking him straight in the eyes snarled: "If you ere not wearing petticoats I would plant two punches on mr ugly snout." He turned on his heel and walked out of the church whistling.

Outside the main door the fat gentleman, hat on head and inds clasped behind him, was still wearily waiting, peering gross the great square at all the streets running into it.

Du Roy made for la Vie Française. Inside he saw at once om the bustling strenuous manner of the staff that someting out of the way had happened; and hurriedly entered be director's room.

Daddy Walter was standing, flustered and nervous, dictating an article in spasmodic phrases, giving assignments, between argraphs to a crowd of reporters round him, issuing institutions to Boisrenard and opening the mail.

He was delighted to see du Roy.

"Ah! What luck! Here's Bel-Ami!"

He broke off, a little embarrassed and apologized: "Pasorry I called you that but I'm half off my head. Hearing my wife and daughters talk of you as 'Bel-Ami' day in and dout, I've got into the habit myself. I hope you don't mind." Georges laughed. "Not in the least. I like it."

Bel-Ami, like every one else. Now listen. There have be great goings on. The ministry has fallen by three hundre and ten votes to two hundred. All our vacations are careelled, put off to the Greek Kalends and here we stick to the twenty-eighth of July at least. Spain is working to trouble over Morocco and that's what's thrown out Durand l'Aine and his gang. We are in it ourselves, up to the need Marrot is entrusted with the job of forming the new Cabine He is taking General Boutin d'Acre for War and our materior portfolio himself and the Presidency of the Counce with it. We are going to be the official Government orgal I'm doing the leading article now, a simple declaration principles, mapping out their policy for the ministers."

The old fellow smiled and added: "And they'll have to the line, that's understood. But I want something interesting on the Morocco question, something realistic, sensations right up to date? Can you manage it for me?"

Du Roy reflected a moment: "I'll give you the very thin An article on the political situation in the whole of our Africa colony with Tunis on the left, Algeria in the middle and Morocco on the right, an account of the races populating the whole territory and a plan for an expedition on the Morocca frontier up to the great Oasis of Figuig where no Europea has yet penetrated and which is the cause of the actual dipute. How will that do?"

Daddy Walter exclaimed: "First rate! What title?"

"From Tunis to Tangier!"

"Excellent!"

Du Roy, left to go through the files of la Vie Française, retrieve his very first article "Reminiscences of a Chasse d'Afrique" which debaptized, furbished up and modifie ald completely meet the case from beginning to end since motif was colonial policy, the Algerian population and an mrsion into the province of Oran.

In three quarters of an hour the whole thing was remade, tched up and brought up to date by some topical words of ttery and commendation of the new Cabinet.

The director read it though enthusiastically: "It's perfect," said... "perfect...perfect. You are a most valuable man. ngratulations." Du Roy went home to dinner satisfied with day, in spite of the check at Trinity.

His wife was waiting for him impatiently. The moment Vsaw him she cried: "Have you heard? Laroche is minister Foreign Affairs!"

"Yes, I've just done an article on Algeria for the occasion."

"What article?"

You know it; the first one, the one we wrote together, eminiscences of a Chasseur d'Afrique,' revised and corted to meet the case."

She smiled: "Ah! yes, that was smart of you." She thought wer for a little while. "I have an idea: that series you were ng to follow that one up with ... and ... abandoned. We uld begin it straight away. It would be a very effective ies, just the thing in the present state of affairs."

Sitting down to his soup, he answered: "You're right; and re's no one to stop it now that euckold of a Forestier is 1d."

This time she took him up. Her tone was sharp and offended. This form of humour is in bad taste and I must ask you put an end to it. It has gone on long enough."

He might have given some sarcastic reply; but a telegram s brought to him containing one solitary sentence without y signature: "I had lost my head. Forgive me and come morrow, four o'clock. Monceau Park."

He understood and his heart jumped with joy; slipping blue form into his pocket, he said to his wife.

I won't do it any more, darling. I own I was in the ong."

He began his dinner; all through it the words ran through repulsed him, recoiled from his mouth, in spite of herself sh was returning his kisses. Quite suddenly her struggles ceased and conquered, submissive, she let him undress her. One by one, skilfully and quickly with fingers as light as those of lady's maid, he removed every single part of her attire.

With her hands she had drawn a petticoat to her, to try t conceal the lower part of her body, and stood, all white, ami her clothing, strewn about her feet.

She let him remove her shoes and carry her in his arms to wards the bed. Then she murmured in broken tones: "swear to you...I have never had a lover." Just as a youn girl would have said: "I swear to you that I am a virgin."

And he thought. "Well! well! Here is someone like myself!"

CHAPTER V

The du Roys had stayed in Paris the whole tring the short parliamentary recess had concernaging in favour of the ministry.

he situation was threatening and, although it early October, both Chambers were resuming ously believed there would be any Tangier ite of an eloquent speech, on Parliament being a Conservative deputy, the Count de Lambert ike the celebrated Viceroy of India of old time wager his moustache that there would be one. "The African Protectorate, gentlemen, is to tie fire-place in which we are burning our best ace with such an enormous draught that it is all the paper in the Bank."

ecame famous and was the basis of a series of du Roy on the Algerian colony, the projected series of his early days with the paper. In y supported the proposed military expedition onvinced that there would never be one. He atriotic drum and bombarded Spain with a of those specious arguments with which we the presume to have interests at variance with the ministry it received first hand increased enorthal it was the mouthpiece of Authority. From the ministry it received first hand information tical events; and every journal in Paris and the to it for news. It was quoted, feared and, to a respected. It was no longer the shady agent political wire-pullers but the avowed cabinet ne-Mathieu was the paper's mind and du Roy ldy Walter, dumb deputy and crafty director, shadows, busy, rumour said, with a big and dubious deal in Morocco copper mines.

Madeleine's salon had become a centre of influence, meeting place every week of various cabinet ministers. En the President of the Council had twice dined at her hou and statesmen's wives who, a little before would have he tated to cross her threshold now competed for a nod from her, paying calls which she seldom returned.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs reigned almost like master in the house. He came at all times with despatel plans, news which he would dictate sometimes to the husba sometimes to the wife as if they were his secretaries.

Du Roy disliked this jumped-up mediocrity, and alone v Madeleine after the minister's departure, his tone was o temptuous and inclined to be threatening.

Madeleine was not impressed and would shrug her sh ders contemptuously: "Do as well as he has done. Bee a minister yourself. Then you can afford to talk. Till the keep quiet."

On one of these occasions, tugging his moustache he st perhaps, you will find out."

She answered composedly: "We live and learn."

On the morning of the re-opening of Parliament the yo wife, still in bed, was driving home innumerable admonit to him. He was dressing and was due to lunch at M Laro Mathieu's and receive instructions before the sitting, for next day's political leader in la Vie Française. The article to be the official announcement of the cabinet's program for the session. "And mind, above all, don't forget to him if General Belloncle is to be ambassador at Oran, a rumoured. If he is, it is very significant and means a lot."

Georges replied testily: "I know what to do as well as do. Give me a rest from your endless repetitions."

She went on calmly: "My dear, you forget half the omissions I give you for the Minister."

"Blast your minister," he growled. "I'm sick of He's a fool."

She was unperturbed: "He is no more my minister is more useful to you than to me."

1 to her with a laugh: "Anyway he doesn't make ered slowly: "Nor to me either. But he's making ced him momentarily, then he went on: "If I had one amongst your admirers, I think I should prefer elshead de Vaudrec. What's become of him by the more than a week since I've seen him."

i, '' she said, without emotion. "He wrote me that with gout. You ought to look him up, with the know he likes you, and it would please him."

course, I'll look him up."

in ished dressing and after a final glance round to ad forgotten anything, went to the bed and kissed the forehead. "Au revoir, darling, I shan't be back the earliest."

he-Mathieu was expecting him. He was lunching clk that morning, the cabinet sitting at midday be-opening of Parliament.

or the presence of the minister's parliamentary new lunched alone, Mme Laroche-Mathieu not being change the hour of her own meal. Du Roy ranticle outlining its scheme from rough notes scribsiting eards.

anything you would like to modify, my dear ittle, my dear fellow. Perhaps you are a little bit about the Morocco business. Speak of the exif it ought to take place, but hint that it will not, personally, don't expect it. Let the public read e lines that we're not going to burn our fingers in ure."

I understand. Rely on me. My wife wants me if General Belloncle is to be ambassador to Oran.

what you've told me I presume he is not."

not."
nversation turned to the opening session. Laroche-

Mathieu began to orate, rehearsing the sentences he was going to inflict on his colleagues a few hours later on. He brandished his right hand, cleaving the air with a fork, knife or piece of bread, looking at no one, addressing the invisible assembly literally expectorating liquid eloquence of the intellectual leve of a fifth form schoolboy.

A tiny waxed moustache adorned his upper lip with two twin points like scorpions' tails and his hair, greasy with brilliantine and parted in the middle, was plastered down over his temples in the fashion of the typical small town dandy Though a young man, he was a little too fat, a little too puffe and a little two smug. His secretary, doubtless quite used if these oratorical shower baths, calmly went on eating and drinking; but du Roy, intensely jealous of his success muttered to himself: "What a lout! What numbskulls these politi cians are!"

Comparing himself, at his own valuation, with this gabblin mediocrity of a minister he thought: "Christ, if only I had hundred thousand francs to appear with before my own Rouen election committee what a statesman I would make be the side of these witless blackguards."

M Laroche-Mathieu continued his harangue from soup t coffee and then, realizing he was late called for his carriage He shook hands with the journalist.

"Is everything clear old fellow?"

"Perfectly, my dear minister, rely on me."

Being disengaged till four o'clock du Roy went to the offic to begin his article. At four he was due at the rue d Constantinople to meet Mme de Marelle who came there regu larly twice a week on Mondays and Fridays. entered the reporter's room a sealed note was handed him it was from Mme Walter and read:

"It is absolutely necessary that I speak to you to-day. I is very serious, most serious. Meet me at two o'clock rue d Constantinople. I can do you a great service.

"Your love until death.

Virginie."

He swore. ."Nom de Dieu! What a woman!" And roughly disgruntled, he flung out of the office, too exasperatto work.

For six weeks he had been trying to break with her, withthe least slackening in her mad infatuation.

After her surrender she had undergone agonies of remorse at three successive rendezvous had overwhelmed her lover h reproaches and maledictions. Bored by these scenes and eady satiated with the middle-aged melodramatic woman he I simply kept away from her, hoping that by this means, affair would die a natural death. It was useless. She had ng to him desperately, casting herself, so to say, into love as she was jumping into a river with a stone tied to her neck. had allowed himself to be recaptured, partly through akness, partly good nature, and partly through a certain ount of liking for her; and now she had him imprisoned in unrestrained cloying passion, and was simply persecuting n with love.

Every single day she wanted to see him and, at any moment, was liable to be summoned by telegrams to meetings at eet corners, in shops and in public parks.

At these appointments she would burble with monotonous ration and in identical words again and again that she ored him and worshipped him. Then she would be off, earing to him that just the sight of him had made her ppy.

She showed herself quite different from what he had anticited, trying to cajole him with school girl graces and baby lk, ridiculous in a woman of her age. Hitherto, strictly conntional, placidly respectable, virginal at heart, immune from ssion, ignorant of all sensuality, to this matter-of-fact asible woman whose middle age had seemed a pale autumn ter a cold summer, had suddenly come a kind of faded spring ll of hadly grown, stunted flowers and withered buds, a range retarded growth of the love of a young girl, clumsily dent, with all the spontaneous high spirits and little gurgling ies of sixteen, awkward veteran antics of one who had never en really young. She wrote him a dozen letters a day, silly girlish effusions, comically poetic, full of allusions to flowe and birds.

Alone with him, she would embrace him with pondero artlessness like a fat elderly tomboy, grotesque grimaces, at little skipping jumps which visibly shook the too hear breasts under her dress. He was continually sickened hearing himself called "my pippin," "my duck," "piewel," "my treasure," "my blue bird," and by seeing hoffer herself with a farcical comedy of girlish prudery, puer little affectations of fear like a boarding school miss run seed which she considered bewitching and beguiling.

She would demand: "Whose lips are these?" and when did not instantly answer: "Mine," would insist on it till nearly collapsed with boredom.

He had expected her to show in love, tact, dignity, p priety, a certain amount of preliminary restraint suitable a matron in her forties, the mother of a family, an experien woman of the world; that her surrender would be serio made with controlled mature passion not without tears, p haps, but the tears of Didon, not those of Juliet.

She would burble to him unceasingly: "How I love; my little one! How dear you are to me, my baby!" He ne heard her say the words "my little one," and "my bab without wanting to retaliate by calling her "my old woman Endlessly she would repeat: "How mad I was to yield i self to you! But I don't regret it. It is good to be in love

It all irritated Georges beyond endurance. She declair the words, "It is good to be in love," like the juvenile lead i theatre.

Then she exasperated him by her clumsy earnestness.

Suddenly become sensual, her blood enflamed by the possion of a young man, she applied herself to the pract technique of love with an indomitable, painstaking persevera and uncouth, methodical assiduity which made du Roy la and which reminded him of old men just learning to read

And at the moment when she should have lain in embrace, fainting yet piercing him with burning terrible g as some women no longer young, do, superb in their last k hen, silent and trembling, her lips should have clung to his, a tired but insatiable would frisk and gambol like an elderly bbledehoy lisping: "I love you so much my little boy. I we you so much. Love your little girl a little more." At that stage he had to stifle the desire to swear, grab his t and clear out, banging the door after him.

At first they were often seen together in the rue de Constinople but, latterly, du Roy, dreading that they might run to Mme de Marelle, invented innumerable excuses to keep r away from there.

This meant that he had constantly to be at her own house, metimes to lunch, sometimes dinner. There she would neeze his hand under the table, and kiss him behind doorwys. Suzanne provided relief, cheering him up with her ely pranks. In that doll-like little body dwelt a quick ischievous wit, ingenuous and incalculable, a light dancing erriment always on show like a marionette at a fair. Her ocking biting little witticisms spared no one and Georges mulated and provoked her. It was always: "Listen Belmi. Come here Bel-Ami," and on these occasions he would omptly desert the mother for her young daughter, who ould murmur some malicious naughtiness in his ear, and they hald both laugh unrestrainedly.

But in spite of this palliative, nauscated by the mother's fatuation he now felt overwhelming repugnance to her: he old no longer see her, hear her, nor think of her without sgust. He stopped going to her house, answering her letters ad yielding to her appeals. She realized, at last, that he no nger cared for her and suffered terribly. But she still stened herself on him, spied on him, followed him, waylaid im in cabs with drawn blinds, outside his office, in doorways, the streets, wherever she thought he might be. He felt ke ill-treating her, hurting her, beating her or saying to her rutally: "Dann you, I've had enough of you. You bore me death." But he put a brake on himself on account of la Vie rançaise, trying by cold reserve, sullen looks and even casional insolence to make her understand that he wanted to nd the affair.

She resorted to all kinds of tricks to gain admission to the flat in the rue de Constantinople and he trembled with anxiet lest the two women should meet face to face there.

His affection for Mme de Marelle on the other hand in creased all the summer. He called her his "little street Arab" and genuinely liked her. Their two dispositions were identical, they were, both of them of the adventurous race of the vagabonds of life, a couple of the world's nomads, gipsing on the broad highway.

They had had a delightful summer of love, a summer of students' outings aand picnics, escaping to lunch or din together at Argenteuil, Bougival, Maisons, Poissy, passin hours on the river gathering flowers from its banks. Sh loved nothing better than to set out with him on a clear day on the top of a suburban omnibus and, brightly chattering while away the time passing through the ugly outskirts of Paris and the hideous middle class bungalows springing up there.

But afterwards when he had to return to dine at Mm Walter's, he detested his elderly implacable mistress, remembering the younger one he had just left who had slaked hidesire and soothed his passion in riverside meadows.

He was actually congratulating himself on having free himself from la Patronne to whom he had conveyed in clear almost brutal fashion his decision to break with her when he received at the office her telegram summoning him at two o'clock to the rue de Constantinople.

He read it again, on his way: "It is absolutely necessar that I speak to you to-day. It is very serious, most serious Meet me at two o'clock rue de Constantinople. I can do you a great service. Your love until death. Virginie."

He thought "What does the old sausage want now? I' wager that she has nothing whatever to tell me. All she'll d is to tell me again that she adores me. Still I must see her She writes about something very serious and doing me great service and there may be something in it. And Clotild is coming at four o'clock. I shall have to get rid of her by three. Sacristi! Let's hope they don't meet. What bitche omen are!"

The thought struck him that his wife was the only one who wer made a nuisance of herself. She went her own way, emed to be fond of him during the times she allocated to love, the never allowed it to interfere with her methodical, scheduled siness routine.

He walked slowly towards the flat, working himself up ainst la Patronne all the day.

I'll give her a piece of my mind if she's got nothing to me. The language of the slums will be academic comred with mine. The first thing I'll make clear to her is at I'll never set foot in her house again."

In this frame of mind he reached the flat and awaited Mme alter there; she arrived almost at once in great excitement: Ah! You got my telegram! How lucky!" His reply was rly, "Parbleu, I found it at the office, just as I was off to a Chamber. What is it you want now?"

She had raised her veil to kiss him and came to him with the nid, submissive air of an oft-beaten dog.

"How cruel you are to me.... Why do you speak so unnuly? You never think how I suffer on your account."

He groaned: "Don't start that all over again."

She came closer waiting only a smile, an inviting gesture throw herself into his arms: "You should never have taken e, if you were going to treat me like this; you should have to me, contented and happy as I used to be. Remember all a promised me in the church and how you made me come to this flat by force. And now you can speak to me like at! This is your welcome to me! How can you be so uneling!"

He answered her savagely: "Zut! Enough of that! I n't see you for a single moment without hearing the same erlasting refrain. Any one would think that I had seduced at twelve years of age and that you were as ignorant as a angel. No, my dear, stick to the facts, this was no rape a minor girl. You gave yourself to me at a ripe sensible age, thank you for that, I am extremely grateful for it but I'm rainly not going to be tied to your apron-strings till death.

You have a husband and I have a wife. We are neither of free. We gratified our fancies, nobody saw it, nobody kne of it and now it's over."

"Oh! How brutal you are, how shameless and common! I was not a young girl, but I had never loved, never fallen

He interrupted her: "I know that. You have told me twenty times. But you had had two children.... It was your first experience."

She drew back shocked: "Oh! George, that's a vile the to say.''

She pressed her hands to her breast and began to sob, whinereased his exasperation. He took up his hat: "Te again! So you've come here to put over this act once me Well, good evening." She stepped forward and barred way out; and violently snatching her handkerchief from pocket dried her eyes. With great difficulty she managed control her voice.

"No," she said sorrowfully.... "I did not come for that I came to...to give you information...political news...to you in the way of earning fifty thousand francs...even me if you want to."

Instantly he changed his tone, became ingratiating

"What's that? What do you mean?"

"Last evening I happened to overhear a conversat between my husband and Laroche. They never mind speak before me, they think I don't bother to listen. But Wal advised the minister not to let you in on the secret for f you might give it away."

Du Roy put down his hat; he waited suddenly attent

"What is it?"

"They are going to seize Morocco!"

"Nonsense. I have just lunched with Laroche, he told what the Cabinet's plans are."

"No, dear, they're only fooling you because they don't w you to have any inkling of their real design."

"Sit down," said Georges; and did so himself on a country She drew a footstool to her and sat between the young makenes, continuing in obsequious tones.

entirely of you, that now I listen to every ey talk about."

etly to explain how, for some time past, she they were planning something unknown to im as a catspaw. "You know," she boasted, love, one becomes clever."

savoury business, a very unsavoury business pared behind the scenes; and this middle-aged anaged to take it all in. She was all smiles er own astuteness; she began to put on airs, ncier's wife, well-versed in stock exchange lling, manipulation of prices, speculations a couple of hours on thousands of little people, nade their investments trusting implicitly in ted names, in politicians, statesmen, bankers. "Oh! It's a very big coup they are making, er is the mind behind it and the other is the is really a tremendous coup."

naries made him impatient: "Come, tell me is it. The Tangier expedition definitely from the first day that Laroche took over the portfolio; and little by little they have bought the Morocco loan which had fallen to sixtyranes. They have bought very skilfully by t agents without raising the least suspicion. It going to launch the expedition and seize rench State will guarantee the debt. Our two te fifty or sixty millions. You see their game? I how afraid they are of the slightest indiscreting leaking out?"

ng her head against his waistcoat, her arms on ing herself to him, clinging to him, realizing s really interesting him, ready to do anything, e for one kiss, even for a smile.

ite sure, of all this?"

positive!"

t, it is indeed a tremendous business. And, as for that swine of a Laroche this is where I put the serew chim. The blackguard! He had better be careful...he had better look to himself...his job as a minister will lie between my fingers!"

He added thoughtfully: "We ought to be able to make something out of this."

"You can still buy some of the loan," she said; "it's on at seventy-two francs."

"Yes, but I haven't any ready capital."

She looked at him, her eyes full of entreaty: "I ha thought of that, my pet, and if you were nice, really nice, you loved me a little you would let me lend it to you."

He replied sharply, almost roughly: "No! That's quite o of the question."

"Listen," she said imploringly. "There isn't a thing y can do unless you borrow the money. I want to invest thousand francs myself on this loan so as to provide a lit nest-egg for myself. Well, I'll put up twenty thousand inster You can take up half of it. I'm not going to borrow the mon from Walter; it's my own. You won't have to pay any colown. If it's successful you gain seventy thousand francif it's a total loss you owe me ten thousand which you can p me back when you like."

He still muttered: "No, I don't approve of these parts ships."

Then she argued that as it was he who, in la Vic França had conducted the whole political campaign and thus mathe scheme a practical issue it was only fair he should have share in the profits and he would be a fool not to; and whole still hesitated she added: "Look upon it as if it is rea Walter who is putting up ten thousand frances for you, services rendered."

"All right," he said at last, "I'll come in with you for thousand francs. If we lose I'll pay it back to you."

She was so delighted that she got up, drew his face to with both hands and kissed him rapturously.

He made no resistance at first, then, as she grew warm straining him to her and devouring him with kisses he reflect at the other woman would be coming presently and that if gave in, he would waste in the arms of the middle-aged man the ardour that he wanted to keep for the young one. he gently repelled her. "Come be sensible," he pleaded. She looked at him with doleful eyes: "Oh! Georges, I can't on kiss you nowadays."

He excused himself: "No, not to-day. I'm a little out of es and that sort of thing really upsets me."

At once mollified and docile she sat down again between his ges. Then asked: "Well, you come and dine to-morrow at a house? That would be lovely."

He hesitated but was afraid to decline: "Yes, of course."

"Thanks, darling,"

She was slowly rubbing her cheek against the young man's est in a caressing regular movement and one of her long ack hairs adhered to his waistcoat. She noticed it and a similar idea occurred to her, one of those superstitious llies so typical of women. She began softly entwining the ir round a button. Then she twisted another hair round the xt button and so on until the process was complete with a ir round every one.

Kissing, he was going to detach them. She stopped him. It mild bring him good luck, she said. He would be carrying out with him, without noticing it something of herself, a the lock of her hair which he had never asked for. It would a tiny bond by which she tied him to her, a secret bond, visible, a talisman that she left upon him. Without conscious fort it would make him think of her, dream of her and love or a little more, all the next day. Suddenly he interrupted or: "I shall have to leave you now; I have to go to the House of the end of the session. If won't fail to-morrow."

She sighed: "Already?" Then resignedly added: "Very all, darling but be sure and come to-morrow." She rose to be the head was aching; a sharp quick pain as if her skin at been pricked with a needle. Her heart was throbbing, at she was satisfied even at having suffered so long as it was r his side.

"Good-bye," she said.

He tolded her in his arms with a pleasant smile and kisse her eyes mechanically; but she, excited even by this frig contact murmured once more.

"Already," and her eyes entreated him.

He drew away from her and put on a hurried tone: "I mis get away. I'm late even now."

He barely touched the lips she offered: "Really now, you must go. It's past three o'clock"; and she left with the fina injunction: "To-morrow at seven o'clock." He turned to the left and she to the right.

Du Roy went up the hill to the outer boulevard, descending he strolled slowly along the boulevard Malesherbes Passing a confectioner's he noticed some iced chestnuts and bought a pound for Clotilde, knowing she was very fond them. At four o'clock he was back in the flat waiting for his mistress. She came a little late, her husband having arrived for a week's stay; and her first words were: "Ca you dine with us to-morrow? He will be very pleased to se you."

"Sorry I can't. I'm dining with la Patronne. We are bus on a regular conglomeration of political and financial schemes

She had already removed her hat and was now taking of her corsets which irked her.

He showed her the bag on the mentelshelf: "I've brough you some iced chestnuts."

She clapped her hands delightedly: "How nice! What darling you are!" Taking one and tasting it she said "They're delicious. I don't think I shall leave a single one then with a sensuous glance at Georges: "You cater for a my weaknesses.'' .

She went on eating the chestnuts slowly with an eye at the time on the bottom of the bag to see whether there wer any left.

"Now you sit on the couch and I'll sit on the stool and finish them all;" and he obeyed smiling to see her cuddled a his knees just as Mme Walter had been an hour earlier.

She raised her head to speak to him, her mouth full. "Do you know darling, I've been dreaming of you. meant that we were on a long journey just the two of us, builted on a camel. He had two humps, we were each seated fone of them and were crossing the desert. We had brought ndwiches in a bag and wine in a bottle and were picnicking our humps. But I didn't like it because we couldn't do bything; we were too far apart, so I wanted to get down."

He answered: "I too, I want to get down."

He laughed, amused at her little story and led her on, couraging her chatter and childish antics, all the tender ipidities that lovers indulge in. The same prattling that he wed in the mouth of Mme de Marelle was what exasperated m coming from Mme Walter.

Clotilde had just the same trick of calling him. "My little of, my darling, my babby," and the words sounded sweet and ressing. Said by the other woman an hour earlier they had red and irritated him. For the vocabulary of love, always entical, imbibes the flavour of the lips from whence it mes.

But even while he was enjoying her chatter, his thoughts me with the seventy thousand frances he was going to earn id he abruptly stopped her by two little taps on the head the his fingers: "Listen, my pet. I'm going to entrust you the a commission to your husband. Tell him, from me, to vest to-morrow ten thousand frances in the Morocco loan hich is now at seventy-two, and I promise that he will make om sixty to eighty thousand frances within three months. Apose absolute silence on him. Tell him from me that the menter expedition is definitely decided on and that the rench State is going to guarantee the whole Moroccan debt. Ind he's not to say a word. It's a State secret that I'm usting him with."

She listened attentively: "Thank you. I will tell my husnd this evening. You can rely on him; he won't say a rd. There is no fear of that, he is a very dependable man."
She had eaten all the chestnuts by now and, squeezing the per bag in her hands, threw it into the grate. Then she id: "Come, let's lie down," and without rising began to ibutton Georges' waistcoat.

Suddenly she stopped and drawing between her fingers long hair she had taken from a button, began to laugh: "Wel well! So you're carrying about a hair of Madeleine's. There a faithful husband for you!"

Then her face changed and became thoughtful while st carefully examined the long almost imperceptible thread sh had found: "This is not Madeleine's, it is dark brown."

He smiled: "Probably the chamber-maid's." But she wa now scrutinizing his waistcoat as carefully as a detective in vestigating a crime and unrolled another hair from a secon button; then she saw a third. Pale and beginning to tremb she cried: "Oh! you've been to bed with a woman and sh has twined these hairs round every button."

Perfectly amazed he mumbled: "Certainly not. How sill you are..." Suddenly he remembered the incident. It made him a little uneasy at first, then he chuckled, not altogethe displeased that she should suspect him of other conquests.

She went on searching and found hair after hair which she feverishly disentangled and threw on the floor.

With a woman's instinct she guessed everything and fle into a frantic rage storming hysterically at him:

"That woman loves you...and she wants you to carr something of hers about with you.... Oh! you vile traitor...

She gave a shrill triumphant scream.

"Ah!...Ah!...so she is an old woman...here is a whit hair.... So you take an old woman nowadays, do you!... suppose they pay you...tell me, do they pay you?.... § you prefer old women...then you don't need me...go her . . . ''

She rose and running for her blouse which she had throw across a chair began to put it on rapidly.

He was nonplussed but tried to stop her: "No! no!...(No.. You're all wrong... I had no idea that it was...listen.. don't go...please sit down."

She would have none of it and kept repeating:

"Stick to your old woman...hang on to her...make you self a ring with her hair...her white hair...you have enoug of it for that..." With quick violent gestures she dresse erself and put on her hat and veil; and as he tried to detain er slapped his face vigorously, wrenched the door open and ed leaving him dumbfoundered, ludicrously discomfited and nuttering dire reprisals against "that old cow of a Mother Walter," whom he would put in her place once and for all nd none too gently either. He bathed his smarting face in old water and flung out of the flat swearing vengeance. This ime he would not forgive her; no, he would teach her her lace.

Walking slowly down the boulevard he stopped before a sweller's shop window looking at a chronometer which he had ranted for a long time, marked at eighteen hundred francs. His reflections became more cheerful. If he made that seventy housand francs he could buy it. He gloated over what he sould do with such a sum. First he would secure nomination is a deputy, then he would buy the chronometer, then dabble in 'change, then . . .

He wanted to keep away from the office and avoid seeing Walter till after he had talked things over with Madeleine and written his article, so he turned towards home.

At la rue Drouot he pulled up sharply; he had forgotten all bout his promised call on the Count de Vaudrec. So he turned back and made for the Count's house in Chaussée-d'-Autin, it a leisurely pace, his mind full of pleasurable reflections and anticipations, the coming fortune, the outsmarting of the mspeakable Laroche, the discomfiture of that old shrew la Patronne. He was no longer much perturbed by Clotilde's wrath, feeling fairly certain that she would forgive him.

At the Count's house, he asked the concierge to take in his card.

"How is M de Vaudrec? I hear he has not been well the last few days." The man replied: "His Excellency is desperately ill, monsieur. He is not expected to live through the night, the gout has reached his heart."

Du Roy was so taken aback that he did not know what he was doing. Vaudree dying! A crowd of vague, confused, disturbing thoughts began to harass his mind, thoughts that he dared not own, even to himself.

"Thanks...I shall return..." He spoke mechanically without knowing what he was saying; then hailed a cab and went straight home.

His wife had returned and was in Her room. He blurtee out his news at once.

"Have you heard? Vaudree is dying."

She was sitting down, reading a letter and raised her eye abstractedly repeating: "Hello! you were saying... you were saying?"

"I am saying that Vaudree is dying from an attack of gov touching the heart;" then he added, "what do you intend doing?

Her whole body stiffened. Her face went livid and began to twitch convulsively. She broke into passionate weeping, hiding her face on her hands and sat there shaking with sobs, grief stricken.

Quite suddenly she became mistress of herself again and dried her eyes.

"I must...I must go there.... Don't worry about me... I don't know what time I shall be back Don't wait for me.''

He answered: "Of course. (to." They clasped hands and she was gone, so hastily that she forgot to take her gloves with her.

Having dined alone Georges began writing his article exactly following the minister's instructions, giving his readers to understand that the Morocco expedition would not take place. He took it to the journal, had a few minutes' chat with the director and left smoking and in high spirits, with out quite knowing why.

His wife had not returned. He went to bed and slept soundly.

It was towards midnight when Madeleine came back. Georges was abruptly awakened to find her sitting on the side of the bed.

"Well?"

He had never seen her so pale and stricken. She murmured; "He is dead."

"Ah! And ... did he say anything to you?"

"Nothing. He was unconscious when I arrived."

Georges was thoughtful. There are questions one longs to k but dare not.

"Lie down," he advised her.

She undressed quickly and glided in beside him.

He resumed: "Were there any relations at his bed-side?" "None, except one nephew."

"Ah! Did he often see him, this nephew?"

"Never. They had not met for ten years."

"Had he any other relations?"

"No...I don't think so."

"Then . . . it is this nephew who will inherit?"

"I don't know."

"Was Vaudrec very rich?"

"Yes, very wealthy."

"Have you any idea, what he was worth, roughly?" "No, not for certain. One or two millions perhaps."

He said no more. She extinguished the lamp; and they y, extended, side by side in the night, silent, wakeful, ponring.

He had no wish to sleep. The seventy thousand francs omised by Mme Walter sounded paltry now. Suddenly he t the idea that Madeleine was weeping. He felt he must low and spoke to her to find out.

"Are you asleep?"
"No."

Her voice was broken and trembling.

"I forgot to tell you, just now, that your minister has been oling us both."

"In what wav?"

And he told her fully and in detail the swindle contrived tween Laroche and Walter.

When he had finished she asked him: "How do you know 1 this? "

"You must permit me not to disclose that. You have sours of information which I don't have access to. I have mine o, which I wish to keep to myself. But I am completely sure of my ground in this case."
She murmured thoughtfully:

"Yes. It's quite possible. I myself have had my suspicions that they were planning something between them." But Georges' thoughts were now elsewhere. He was not in the least sleepy. He had drawn closer to his wife and very softly pressed a kiss on her ear. She sharply repulsed him: "Leave me alone, can't you? I'm in no mood for that sort of thing."

And Georges resignedly turned his face to the wall, and closing his eyes, ended by sleeping soundly after all.

CHAPTER VI

THE Church was draped in black, and over the west door a huge escutcheon surmounted by a coronet proclaimed to the world that a nobleman was being buried.

The service had just ended and the congregation was filing slowly past the coffin and by the Count de Vaudrec's nephew, who was shaking hands and acknowledging condolences.

Leaving the Church Georges du Rov and his wife walked slowly homeward together, silent and preoccupied.

At length Georges muttered as if to himself:

"It is really most surprising."

Madeleine took him up.

"What is, dear?"

"That Vaudree has not left anything to us!"

She blushed vividly as if a pink veil had suddenly been stretched across her white skin.

"Why should be have left us anything? There was not the least reason why he should."

Then after a little reflection she added:

"Perhaps some lawyer has a will. We shan't know for a while."

He considered this likely.

"Yes, probably so, for he was our best friend—best friend to both of us, I mean. He dined twice a week at our place and came and went at all times. It was a home from home to him, actually his real home. He loved you like a father, and he had no family, no children, no brothers or sisters, only one solitary nephew and a very distant one at that. Yes, he ought to have made a will. I don't look for anything big, just a souvenir as a token that he thought of us, that he loved as and acknowledged the regard we had for him. Some mark of affection for us both."

She said, with an abstracted, indifferent air:

"Well, there is the possibility that he left a will."

Entering their house they found a note awaiting them. It was addressed to Madeleine. She opened it and handed it to her husband.

BEL-AMI

M LAMANEUR SOLICITOR, 17, rue des Vosges.

Madame,

I shall be obliged if you will give me a call on Tuesday Wednesday or Thursday between the hours of two and four on private business concerning yourself.

Yours etc. Lamaneur.

It was Georges' turn to redden and he did: "Upon my word, that's odd. It is strange that it should be you he sends for and not for me, when I am the legal head of the family."

She answered nothing at first and, when she did, ignored the point.

"Would you like us to go there now!"

"Yes, that's the best way."

At M Lamaneur's office the head clerk received them with marked deference and at once showed them into his principal's room.

The notary was a tubby little man completely round. His head looked like a ball fixed on to another ball and his stocky legs were so small and short that they seemed to make a third.

He shook hands, indicated chairs and turned to Madeleine, "Madame, I have asked you to call to inform you of the Count de Vaudree's will, which concerns yourself."

Georges, unable to keep quiet, muttered: "Just what I feared."

The lawyer went on: "I am going to rend it to you. It is quite short."

He drew a sheet of paper from a file and read its contents aloud: "'I the undersigned Paul Emile Cyprien Contran, Count de Vaudrec being of sound mind and body declare this to be my last will.

"Death being likely to bear us away at any moment I wish n anticipation of that event to take the precaution of making his my will which will be deposited with M Lamaneur.

Not having any direct heirs I leave my whole fortune combeising in personal estate some six hundred thousand francs and my real estate comprising in value some five hundred thousand francs to Mme Claire-Madeleine du Roy for her absolute property. I beg her to accept this gift from a dead friend as a proof of his devoted, profound and respectful laffection.

The solicitor added: "That's all. This will is dated in the month of August last and replaces another exactly similar document made two years ago in favour of Mme Claire-Madeleine Porestier. I hold the first will and in case of any litication on the part of the family, it will prove that the wishes of M the Count de Vaudree have in no way changed."

Madeleine, very pale, was looking at her feet; Georges was hervously tugging at his moustache. After a moment's silence the lawyer resumed: "I suppose you are aware, Monsieur, that more wife cannot accept this bequest without your legal con-

Du Roy rose and then said coldly: "I must have time to think it over."

The lawyer gave smiling assent and added pleasantly: "I mite understand your scruples and why you hesitate, Monsienr. I may add that the Count's nephew whom I informed of his uncle's last wishes, this morning expressed himself as mite willing to accept the will, provided Madame will allow him one hundred thousand francs out of the estate. In my opinion the will is unassailable but, if it is contested, it will mean publicity and scandal which it would be just as well to woid. The world generally puts an evil construction on things. In any event perhaps you will let me know your decision on the whole matter by Saturday."

Georges bowed with stiff formality. His wife had not spoken a word. He ushered her out and left the office with meh obvious perturbation that the solicitor was no longer smiling.

At home, Georges slammed the door, threw his hat on the bed and bluntly challenged his wife:

"You were de Vaudrec's mistress?"

Madeleine had raised her veil. She turned sharply:

"What! I?"

"Yes, you! No one leaves his whole estate to a woman except when..."

Her fingers were trembling so violently that she could no remove the pins tying her veil.

She thought for a moment, then said agitatedly:

"Come...come...you are mad...you are...you are...yh only a little while ago you yourself were hoping he would leave you something."

Georges stood facing her, watching every gesture, every emotion like a magistrate seeking to surprise a criminal in the least admission. Emphasizing each word, he said:

"Yes ... to me ... he would have left something to me ... to me, your husband...to me, his friend...note the difference... to me...but not to you...to you a woman friend ... to you... The distinction is all important, vital from the my wife.

point of view of decency...and of public opinion,"

Madeleine, in her turn, was gazing at him fixedly, straight in the eyes, with singular and profound concentration, as if she were trying to read something there, to probe into that unexplored region of the mind that no one ever penetrates and of which one very rarely obtains a bare glimpse in fleet ing seconds, in unguarded moments of recklessness or inattention, those moments which are like doors left half open to the mysteries of the soul within. She spoke very slowly:

"On the other hand it seems to me that if...that people might find it just as peculiar if he had left a legacy of that size...to you."

He demanded sharply:

"Why?"

"Because"-she hesitated then went on-"because you are my husband...because you have known him only a little while... because I have been his friend for a very long time...because his first will made when Forestier was alive was in my favour

Georges was pacing up and down with long strides. He reclared:

"You cannot accept it."

She answered with calm indifference:

"Exactly: and it's not worth while waiting till Saturday:

me can let M Lamaneur know at once."

He halted abruptly, facing her; and, again they stood, each air of eyes searching the other, striving to fathom the innermost werets of their hearts, to sound the very depths of thought. they tried to strip conscience naked in one burning unspoken mestion: an intimate struggle between two beings living side wside, each going its own way, suspecting, divining, lying in rait for one another yet not knowing the muddy waters of ither soul.

He lowered his voice, almost whispering the words:

"Come now, admit that you were de Vaudrec's mistress?" She shrugged her shoulders: "You are being childish... Jaudree liked me very much, very much indeed...but nothing more . . ever. "

His foot rapped the ground.

"You are lying. It is not possible."

She was quite unperturbed.

"Nevertheless it is true."

He strode up and down the room again; then pulled up. "In that case perhaps you will explain to me why he beneathed his entire fortune to you...to you alone."

She answered with matter-of-fact nonchalance.

"It's quite simple really. As you said just now he had no eal friends except ourselves, or rather except myself for he ad known me from childhood. My mother was lady compaion to his parents. He was a constant visitor to our house nd, as he had no natural heir he thought of me. Perhaps he as a little in love with me, it's quite possible. Show me the oman who has never been loved in that way. It may be that his concealed secret devotion led him to put down my name then he was writing his will. Why not? He used to bring te flowers every Monday. You were in no way put out at that, were you, or at the fact that he never gave you anything Now he has given me his fortune for the same reason and because he had no one else to leave it to. Why shouldn't he give it to me? But on the other hand it really would have been astonishing if he had left it to you. Why should he You were nothing to him."

She spoke so naturally and frankly that Georges was non plussed.

"None the less," he said, "it is out of the question for it to accept this bequest under the present conditions. It would have most deplorable results. Everyone will believe the worst, they will all laugh and jeer at me. My colleagues in the paper are even now inclined to be jealous and backbiting, have to be more than careful of my honour and reputation. It is impossible for me to allow my wife to accept a legacy of this kind from a man whom public rumour has already as sumed to be her lover. Forestier might have tolerated all that but I will not. That's definite."

She murmured sweetly: "Just so! Very well, my dear, lett decline it. It will only be a million or so less in our pockets that's all."

He continued his mechanical patrol, beginning to thin aloud, talking at his wife, not to her.

"Hum! yes...a million...it's hard lines... He didn't understand what tactlessness and disregard of the conventions he was displaying. He didn't realize in what a fals ridiculous position he was placing me... Life is all a matter of proportion... He could easily have left me half of it then there would have been no trouble."

· He sat down, crossed his legs, and began twisting his mous tache, his invariable habit when bored, worried or considering an awkward problem.

Madeleine took up some knitting and began choosing the wool with serene composure. She said calmiy:

"Well, I'm not saying any more. You can do the think ing.

He was a long time replying and when he did it was with marked hesitation.

"Society will never understand de Vaudrec leaving you erything and my acquiescing in it. To receive his fortune that way will be tantamount to admitting...to admitting a lity relationship on your part and a disgraceful connivance it on mine. Just think what sort of interpretation everye will place on it. We must find a way out, a clever means glossing things over. For instance we could give it out that left it to us share and share alike, half to the husband and If to the wife."

She objected: "I don't see how we can do that. A will is formal document, it's on record."

"Oh! That doesn't matter. It's quite simple. You could the over half the inheritance to me by deed of gift. In that y we should close the mouth of spiteful rumour."

She answered a little impatiently: "I still don't see how it is going to close the mouth of anyone. The will is there, public document, signed by Vaudrec. "

'Good Heavens!' he said testily. "Are we going to rish the will in their faces or paste it on the walls? You rather dense my dear. We shall say that the Count de udrec left us his estate, real and personal in two equal res... That's all.... Remember you cannot accept the acy at all without my sanction. I will not give it, except condition that I receive a half share which will prevent me oming a public laughing stock."

Her level gaze pierced him through and through.

'Very well. I agree."

He got up, walking about the room again, and proclaimed sh misgivings, appearing to hesitate still and carefully iding his wife's searching eyes.

'No...decidedly not...perhaps the best thing will be to ounce the whole legacy...it will be more dignified...more per...more honourable...vet by this scheme no one can gest a thing...absolutely not a thing. The most straited puritan will not be able to say a word against it."

Ie stopped before Madeleine: "All right dear, if you like go alone to M Lamaneur and consult him and explain ags. I shall tell him of my scruples and add that we have devised the idea of sharing equally to comply with the eventions, so that no one can criticize us. From the momental tracept half the legacy myself it is obvious that no soul has the right to sneer. It is practically an announment by me: My wife accepts, because I accept, her husby who is the judge of what she can do without compromis herself!' Otherwise there would certainly be a scandal."

Madeleine answered quietly: "I see. I understand perfectly. Do as you like."

He went on talking quickly: "Yes, the plan of sharing, I each, makes everything as clear as day. We jointly inhe from a friend who wished to show no difference, no distinction between us, who didn't want to give the impression anyone of saying: 'I prefer one to the other after my definition just as 'did during my life.' He liked the wife the better the two, admitted, but by dividing his fortune between the equally he wanted to emphasize that his preference was purplatonic. And very likely, if he had thought it over careful that is actually what he would have done. He didn't the didn't foresee the consequences."

She stopped him, a shade irritated: "You are perfectear. I understand you. There is no need for all the protestations. Go to the solicitor at once."

He flushed and faltered: "You are right, I'll go now."

He took his hat. At the door he turned back.

"I'll try to settle with the nephew for fifty thous francs."

She looked, suddenly, discomfited and ashamed: "No, we will share. If we give him fifty thousand each, we divide a million clear between us."

And with a final "Au revoir my little Made," he went and explained the plan to the lawyer, pretending that whole idea was his wife's.

The next day a deed of gift was executed by which Mileine du Roy made over five hundred thousand francs her husband.

It was a fine afternoon and as they left the lawyer's of Georges suggested a stroll along the boulevards. He onstrative, in high spirits, conciliatory and affectionate; was thoughtful and rather cold.

was a sharp autumn day. Georges led his wife to the window, in which he had so often gazed at his longed-phronometer.

Will you let me offer you a present?" he asked her. If you want to." Her reply was indifferent.

ley went inside.

What would you like best, a necklace, a bracelet or a pair arrings?'' The sight of the gold trinkets and precious is dispelled her coldness and her eyes were bright and ous as they ran over the show-case, full of expensive ls.

that's a lovely bracelet," she said eagerly. It was a at, bizarre chain with a different stone for every link. How much is this bracelet?" asked Georges.

Three thousand francs, Monsieur."

f you'll let it go at two thousand five hundred, I'll take e jeweller hesitated and then said it was impossible.

1 Roy tried him again. "Wait, you can add this chronor for fifteen hundred francs, that makes four thousand I'll pay you cash. Is it a deal? If not, I'll go elsewhere." e perplexed jeweller ended by agreeing. "All right; have ur own way, Monsieur;" and the journalist after giving address, added: "Please have my initials engraved on it, C." and above them a baron's coronet."

ideleine was surprised and amused, and as they left the she took his arm with a certain affection. After all, he really smart and alert and now that he was a man of erty, it was only right that he should have a little to go it.

e shopkeeper saluted them obsequiously: "You can rely e. It will be ready by Thursday M le baron."

ey passed the Vaudeville, where there was a new play "Would you like to see the show to-night?" he asked her she accepted the suggestion.

Ve will dine in the Cabaret," he said. He was as happy as a king and sought some additional diversion.

"We might call on Mme de Marelle, if you like; her husban is here and I should like to have a chat with him. We migh ask them to join us."

They called. Georges, who was rather dreading meetn his mistress again, was not displeased that his wife would be present and save the necessity of explanations; but Clotile seemed to recollect nothing and made her husband accept the invitation.

The dinner was a success and they spent a delightful evering.

Georges and Madeleine returned late. The gas was off at Georges lighted their way up the stairs by matches.

On the first floor landing, the sudden flare of a match show up both of them in the staircase mirror.

Springing out of the shadows they looked like two phatoms about to vanish into the night.

Du Roy raised his hand to show their reflections modelearly.

He said with a triumphant laugh. "Behold two millionaires pass by."

THE conquest of Morocco was two months old. France, misress of Tangier, now owned the whole African Mediterranean: past as far as Tripoli and she had guaranteed the debt of her lewly annexed colony.

Rumour had it that two Cabinet ministers had made somehing in the neighbourhood of twenty millions out of the tenture, and was particularly busy with the name of Laroche-

Mathieu.

As regards Walter all Paris knew that he had brought off double coup and had cashed in between thirty and forty fillions on the loan, plus from eight to ten millions in the sopper and iron mines, and also had made enormous sums from immense territories, bought before the conquest for a song, and resold, immediately after the French occupation to solonization companies.

In a matter of a few days he had become a world figure, one of those omnipotent financiers to whom obsequious heads bow, whom fawning tongues flatter, who draw out all that is mean and base and vile in the human heart. No longer was he the Jew Walter, boss of a shady bank, director of a dubious newspaper, deputy suspected of jobbery and corruption. He was Monsieur Walter the wealthy Israelite.

And now he wanted to show it.

Knowing that the Prince of Karlsburg who owned one of the finest mansions in the rue de Faubourg Saint-Honoré, with a garden looking on the Champs-Elysées was in need of money, he made the prince an offer for it, furnished, as it stood. His offer was three millions, and the prince tempted by the sum, accepted it.

The following day the Walters moved in.

Then he had another idea, a truly Napoleonic inspiration to draw all Paris to his new domain.

Society was flocking to see a wonderful painting by the great Hungarian artist Karl Marcowitch on view at the galleries of the expert, Jacques Lenoble; the picture was one of Christ walking on the sea. The art critics unanimously proclaimed it to be the masterpiece of the century.

Walter bought it for five hundred thousand francs and took it away, thus abruptly bringing the daily stream of visitors to an end, and forcing himself on the attention of an indignant public.

Then he announced in the press that on a particular evening, everyone of any standing in society was invited to his house to view the supreme masterpiece of the foreign gening so that no one could complain that he had isolated a work

His house would be open, free to all who cared to come, All that was necessary was to produce an invitation eard at

His advertisement ran: "Monsieur and Madame Walter have pleasure in inviting you to a private view, at their residence on the thirtieth December from nine o'clock to midnight, of the painting by Karl Marcowitch Jesus walking on the waters' illuminated by electric light."

A postscript followed in small print: "Dancing after midnight." Those who wanted to, would stay on for the dance and from these the Walter family would recruit their acquaintances of the morrow. The rest would come only to view the masterpiece and would leave as soon as they had done so, regarding the mansion and its new occupants with contemptuous indifference. But Daddy Walter knew that they would eventually drift back as they did to his brother Israelites once they became rich. All he had to do was to get these titled nonentities whose photographs adorated the illustrated weeklies to set foot once in his house. And they would all do it partly out of curiosity to set eyes on the man who had made eighty millions in six weeks; partly to see and size up the other visitors; and partly because he had had the good taste and tact to invite them to admire an essentially Christian picture in the home of a son of Israel.

He might as well have advertised: "See, I have paid five hundred thousand francs for the Christian masterpiece of arcowitch, 'Jesus walking on the sea', and it belongs to e, will be always under my eyes, in my house, the house of alter, the Jew."

Society, however, that Society of duchesses and jockeys did a concern itself with any ironical aspect of the invitation. Would go there as it would to an exhibition of water colours M Petits: the Walters owned a work of art, on a certain range they would open their doors for Society to view it, if Society would go. That was all.

The Vie Française, for fifteen days published a "puff" in Gossip column of the approaching event and kept public riosity alive.

Du Roy furned at his director's triumph.

He had believed himself wealthy with the five hundred outsind frames out of which he had swindled his wife, but whe considered himself poor, dreadfully poor, comparing smodest fortune with the shower of millions which had en poured around the other man who had done nothing nativer to earn it.

His jealous wrath increased daily. He raged inwardly ainst everyone—the Walters whose house he now sedunly avoided, his wife who, deceived by Laroche had dissuaded in from investing in the Morocco loan, and, above all against a minister who had fooled him, used him as a tool, and who fice a week was still dining at his table. Georges served him secretary, agent and mouthpiece, and when writing at proche's dictation he felt an insane desire to strangle the lumphant daindy. As a minister Laroche was a moderate geess and to keep his portfolio had to conceal the fact that was now stuffed with gold.

But du Roy, sensed this gold day by day in the parvenu wyer's haughtier manner, his more insolent gestures, his ore arrogant speech, his complete self-assurance.

Georges, simmering with rage, put up with it like a dog hich wants to bite but dares not. But he was often curt and harsh towards Madeleine who merely shrugged her soulders indifferently and treated like an unruly child. She as, however, surprised at his constant ill humour and sometimes commented on it: "I can't understand you. You ar grumbling all the time. Yet your position is really magni ficent." He would turn his back, without reply.

At first he had truculently declared that he would not go t the director's fête and that he would not set foot in the lous Jew's house. For the past two months, Mme Walter had bee inundating him with daily letters, begging him to come to her to make an appointment where and when he pleased, so that, a she told him, she could hand over to him the seventy thousan francs that she had earned for him. He never replied an threw her desperate effusions into the fire. Not that he ha the least intention of giving up his share of their joint profit but he wanted to madden her, ill-treat her, trample her unde his feet. She was too wealthy! He wanted to put her in he place.

On the evening of the private view Madeleine urged that h was making a great mistake by keeping away.

"Drop the subject," he replied previshly: "I'm not going,

After dinner he suddenly veered round.

"After all it's a necessary ordeal and we shall have to g through it. Get ready quickly."

She had been expecting the change of front. "I'll be ready in fifteen minutes," she said.

He grumbled all the time he was dressing and even in the carriage went on growling and sulking.

The courtyard of the Karlsburgh mansion was illuminate in its four corners by four electric globes looking like fou little blush moons. A magnificent carpet covered the step of the stone stairway leading into the house on each of which was stationed a man in livery motionless as a statue.

Du Roy muttered: "What a circus," and shrugged hi shoulders, consumed with envy.

His wife answered sharply: "Be quiet and behave yourself, They went inside and handed their outer garments to wait ing footmen.

Several women were there with their husbands taking of their furs.

"Quite a good show, quite impressive," they were saying.

The vestibule was hung with tapestries portraying the story of Mars and Venus. Facing the visitors on the right and left were the banisters of a monumental staircase leading to the first floor.

Inst inside the salons two little girls, one in pink, the other in blue, presented bouquets to the ladies. They looked very charming.

There was already a large crowd in the reception rooms.

Most of the women were in afternoon dress as though to emphasize that they had merely attended in the same way as they would any other private exhibition. Those remaining for the ball wore evening frocks.

Mme Walter, a group of her friends round her, was in the second salon receiving the visitors of whom quite a number ignored her, strolling about as if they were in a museum and not taking the least notice of the owners of the house.

As soon as she caught sight of du Roy she turned livid, took an impulsive step towards him and then stopped, waiting for him. He greeted her stiffly while Madeleine congratulated her warmly.

Then Georges, leaving his wife with la Patronne lost himself in the crowd to listen to the spiteful comments he was certain were being made.

There were five salons sumptuously furnished, decorated with Italian freseos and priceless oriental rugs, their walls hung with paintings by old masters. The whole made a scene of barbaric splendour.

Georges recognized celebrities everywhere, the Duchess of Terracinia, the count and countess de Ravenel, general the prince d'Andremont, the famous and beautiful marquise des Dunes, the élite of fashionable Paris.

Someone caught his arm and a fresh happy young voice whispered in his ear: "Ah! There you are at last, naughty Bel-Ami. Why is it we never see you nowadays?"

He was delighted to see her again and cordially grasped her hand while he made his excuses.

"I couldn't manage it. I have been so busy the last two months that I never go out at all,"

She took him up seriously: "It is naughty of you, very naughty, very naughty indeed. We have been really worried about you, for we are very fond of you, Mamma and I. As for myself I simply can't get along without you. If you are not about I am bored to death. There! Now I've spoken out straight to you so that you won't have the right to disappear like that again. Give me your arm, I'm going to show you 'Jesus walking upon the waters' myself; it is outside behind the conservatory. Papa put it there so that everyone should be compelled to go through the whole mansion. It's amazing, papa is as vain as a peacock over the place."

They walked slowly through the throng. Several turned to look after the handsome young man and the bright doll-like girl: "Look! what a fine couple," and similar admiring comments followed them.

Georges was thinking: "If only I had the sense, this is the one I should have married. It could have been managed somehow. Why did it never occur to me? How did I let myself get landed with the other? What madness! It's always the same with me; acting too quickly and never thinking it out!" And envy, bitter rancorous regret, gnawed at his mind like a canker, bit by bit devouring his peace of mind making his life hateful.

Suzanne's voice interrupted his ugly reflections: "Come often, Bel-Ami, we'll have fun now papa is so rich. We'll have the time of our lives."

His train of thought appeared in his reply: "Oh! you'll get married now. You will wed some noble prince, a little the worse for wear and we shall see no more of one another."

She answered impetuously: "No I shan't. Not yet. I want someone I like, someone I like very much, someone I shall be head over heels in love with. I shall be rich enough for both."

His smile became sarcastic and sneering and he started pointing out to her several of the gentlemen present, bearers of ancient noble names who had trafficked their soiled titles for financiers' daughters like herself and who now flourished, with their wives or separated from them, free, impudent, accepted and respected everywhere.

"I don't give you six months before you'll swallow that You will become Madame la Marquise, Madame la Duchesse, or even Madame la Princesse and you will look down on me from a very lofty height, mademoiselle."

She became very indignant and tapped his arm with her fan rowing that she would marry only as her heart told her.

He laughed: "We shall see all about that; you are far too wealthy."

"But you also, you have come into money surely!"

"Rubbish," he answered contemptuously. "Not worth speaking about. A paltry twenty thousand pounds of landed pronerty. Almost a bagatelle nowadays."

"But your wife has inherited as well?"

"Yes, a million between us both. An income of forty thousand. We can barely afford to keep a carriage on it."

They had reached the last salon and facing them, opening on to the conservatory was a large winter garden full of weird trees and ferns from the Far East and masses of rare orchids and exotic plants. Du Roy suddenly noticed on his left, under a heavy canopy of palm trees, a huge white marble basin as big as a swimming bath upon the sides of which four great Delftware swans poured water from their half open beaks.

Powdered golden sand was at the bottom of this tank and swimming about in it were enormous red fishes, bizarre Chinese monsters with protruding staring eyes and scales tipped with blue, mandarins of the deep standing grotesquely out against the gold background.

The splendour of the whole scene made the journalist actually stare. "Yes," he told himself. "This is the real thing; this is luxury. This is the sort of house I ought to live in. Others are hovels beside it. Why can't I get there?"

His mind roamed vainly over various fantastic impossibilities and he became exasperated at his own impotence.

His companion became silent and pensive; looking at her covertly the thought occurred again to him: "What I should have done was to have married this lively little marionette." Suzanne suddenly livened up again: "Come on," she said pushing Georges through the crowd and making him turn sharply to the right. In the midst of an arbour of rare plants with gently swaying leaves extended like tiny fingers of miniature hands one saw a man standing motionless upon the sea.

The effect was marvellous in its beauty. The background showed the apostles in their little vessel, dimly visible in the slanting rays of a lantern which one of them held and of which the full light fell upon Jesus, walking towards them.

Christ was advancing his foot upon a shadow hollow which was yielding, gently submissive, and caressing the divine tread. All was dark round the Man who is God, save for the stars shining in the heavens. The apostles in the faint light of the lantern, which one of them was holding towards the Lord, seemed petrified with amazement.

It was indeed the supreme breath-taking achievement of a great artist, one of those masterpieces which confound the imagination and dwell in the mind for years.

Even this sorry crowd were momentarily abashed and silent before they began to speculate on the pecuniary value of the picture.

Du Roy after contemplating it for some time observed: "It's nice to have the money to pay for these nick-nacks;" and keeping Suzanne's little hand on his arm, pushed his way out of the jostling crowd.

She asked him: "Would you care for a glass of champagne? Let's go to the buffet. We shall find Papa there." They worked their way back through all the salons and the rapidly swelling mob.

Suddenly Georges heard his own name pronounced:

"It is Laroche and Mme du Roy."

The words brushed his ear lightly like sounds from afar carried by the breeze. Who had spoken them?

His eyes wandered everywhere at once and he saw his wife go by on the minister's arm. They were smiling, talking in low intimate tones, and gazing at one another.

The thought struck him that everyone was sniggering and looking at the couple and he felt a brutal mad impulse to leap them both and beat them to death with his bare fists. So, she was making a laughing-stock of him! His thoughts asked back to Forestier. Perhaps they were now saying: That cuckold of a du Roy.'' Who was she, after all, this ife of his? A clever. jumped up little nobody, and not articularly wealthy either. People came to her house because they feared her, because they knew she could pull strings and jumalist's home. He would never get far in the world with his woman who made his house suspect, who was compromising herself all the time, whose very beauty and allure proplaimed the intriguer. She was now a millstone round his jeck. Ah! If he had only known, if only he had looked thead! He would have played for higher stakes for wealthier jame!

What he could have won with this little Suzanne here, as he stake! What an incredible fool he had been not to have nderstood that! They came to the dining hall, an immense oom with marble columns, hung with ancient Gobelin tapestries. Walter welcomed his foreign editor vociferously. He was eside himself with happiness: "Have you seen everything? buzanne, have you shown him everything? All society is here, sel-Ami, isn't it? Have you seen the Prince of Guerche? He as just had a drink of punch with me."

He darted off to Rissolin the senator who was trailing his ommon overdressed wife along like a walking shop.

A gentleman saluted Suzanne, a slim, fairhaired gentleman, little bald with that air of worldly breeding that one astinctively recognizes. Georges knew him by repute; the farquis de Cazolles, and was instantly jealous of the man. Iow long had the marquis condescended to know her? Since her fortune of course. Georges saw in him, a suitor. Someone took his arm. It was Norbert de Varenne. The old poet booked tired and was aimlessly wandering round with his greasy hair and more greasy clothes, bored and indifferent.

This is what they call enjoyment," he remarked. "Presently hey will dance; then they will go to bed; and the little ladies will be satisfied. Take some champagne. It's quite good."

He filled his own glass and one for du Roy him: "I drink to the revenge of Intellect upor: added pleasantly: "Not that wealth annoys rr that I envy them. I merely lodge my protest G

Georges was not listening. He was looking for had slipped off with the Marquis de Cazolles leaving Norbert de Varenne he disappeared to 1

A throng of thirsty individuals blocked his he got free he turned and found himself face the de Marelles.

He was constantly meeting the wife, but has husband for a considerable time. M de Marell ly grateful.

"My dear fellow," he said. "How can I tl ciently for the advice you gave me through Clo nearly a hundred thousand francs over the MI owe it all to you. You are indeed a loyal fric

Some of the men were gazing appreciatively a turned out, pretty brunette. Du Roy answere for that service, Monsieur, I am taking your wit say, I am offering her my arm. One should at married couples."

M de Marelle bowed: "That's quite fair.

will meet here in an hour's time."

The two young people lost themselves in the by the husband.

"The Walters are in luck's way;" said Clotile to have advance information of coming events !

Georges answered: "Bah! A man with audace get there one way or another." She spoke of t.1:

"There are two girls worth from twenty to each, without counting that Suzanne is really He made no reply. His own thoughts coming else, annoved him.

She had not yet seen the painting and he sta her there. They passed the time with sardonic the passers-by. Saint-Potin went by and amuseby the sight of his breast covered with decorat ble ambassador just behind him, wore far fewer.

"Behold, the cream of society," sneered du Roy.

Boisrenard shook hands with them, adorned with the same need and yellow ribbon he had worn on the morning of the hel.

The Viscountess de Percemur, enormous and resplendent, was hatting with a duke in the little Louis XVI boudoir.

"Tête-à-tête in high life," commented Georges.

Crossing the conservatory he caught sight of his wife, siting close to Laroche-Mathieu, both of them almost hidden which theres. They might as well have proclaimed aloud: Here we are engrossed in one another in a public place. For me dely the conventions."

Mme de Marelle having conceded the fact that Karl faccowitch's Jesus was "quite remarkable," they returned to nd no sign of her husband.

"And Laurine, does she still dislike me these days?"

"Yes, more than ever. She declines to meet you and walks at of the room if anyone mentions your name."

He didn't answer. The sudden hatred of the child grieved ad hurt him.. Suzanne jumped out at them from a doorway. "Ah! There you are. Bel-Ami you're going to be left on I'm taking la belle Clotilde off to show her my nom;" and the two ladies left him gliding across the room ith that undulating snakelike wriggle we reserve for crowds. A voice close to him whispered: "Georges!" It was Mme She went on in low agitated tones: "How brutally ruel you are! I told Suzette to bring you along with your impanion just to have one word with you. Listen, I must... will speak to you this evening ... if not ... if not ... there is o knowing what I will do. Go to the conservatory. You will ee a door on the left; it will let you out into the garden. ollow the path facing you; at the end of it is a little alcove. Vait there for me in ten minutes time. If you fail, I swear I'll ake a scene in front of everyone."

He answered coldly: "Very well. I will be there in ten finutes."

They separated. But Jacques Rival buttonholed him with an interminable anecdote delivered in a very elevated manner he had clearly been patronizing the buffet. With the greates difficulty du Roy unloaded him on M de Marelle, who had appeared at last, and fled. He took particular care not to be seen by his wife or Laroche; and was successful for the seemed quite engrossed in one another. He found the garden

The air was cold and struck him like an ice bath. He muttered: "Christ, I shall get a chill," and wrapped hi handkerchief round his neck like a cravat. Then he grope his way along the footpath, dim after the brilliantly illuminate.

salons.

On his right and left he saw leafless shrubs, their branche rocking dismally in the breeze; greyish lights flickered, gloom reflections from those in the mansion. Something white appeared in his path and Mme Walter, arms and neck bare faltered hysterically:

"Ah! You're come at last! Do you want to kill me?"

He answered coolly:

"No melodrama please, or I'll clear off at once."

She threw her arms round him, her lips reaching for his. "But what have I done? Why are you so cruel to me What have I done to you?"

He tried to push her away.

"I'll tell you what you have done. Last time, you were with me you twined some of your hair round my buttons and that has estranged my wife from me."

· She was taken aback, then shook her head vigorously:

"Oh! Your wife wasn't the one. It must have been one of your mistresses who created a scene."

"I have no mistresses."

"Be quiet! Why do you never come to see me? Why do you refuse to dine with us even once a week? It is abominable the way I suffer. I love you so, that I never have a though that is not of you, cannot look at anything without seeing you before my eyes, dare not speak a word for fear of uttering you name! You can't begin to understand it, a man like you. seem to be caught in a vice, smothered in a sack. The ever present remembrance of you dries up my throat, tears an s something inside me, my heart, my breast, cramps and rs my limbs so that I cannot walk, making me sit like mimal all day, on a chair thinking of you."

stared at her, amazed. This was no longer the fat playfool he had known but a woman lost, frantic, capable of hing. A vague plan was taking shape in his mind.

answered quietly:

My dear, love is not eternal. One takes it and leaves it. when it goes on and on as it has between us, it may become wible burden. I don't want any more of it. That is the a truth. However, if you can learn to be reasonable and receive and treat me only as a friend I will call on you The thing is are you capable of it?"

placed her bare arms on his black coat and answered:

I am capable of anything, just to see you."

Then it is agreed; we are to be friends and nothing more." he faltered: "It is agreed," then lifted her lips to kiss Kiss me just once...the last time."

e gently refused.

No, we must hold to our agreement."

he turned away, drying her tears, then drew from her age a packet of papers tied with pink silk ribbon and red it to him.

Take it. It is your share of the profits in the Morocco mess. I was so happy to have earned that for you. Please made to refuse it: "No, I shan't accept that money." he flared up again: "Ah! You won't take it from me now! yours, it belongs to you. If you refuse it I'll throw it in gutter. Don't make me do that Georges."

took the little packet and slipped it in his pocket.

We must go back. You will take a chill."

he murmured: "So much the better! If I could only die;" seized his hand and kissed it with passion, rage and desand fled towards the house.

e walked back, slowly, thoughtfully, and returned to the servatory smiling.

His wife and Laroche were no longer there. The crowd lessening and it was evident that only a few were staying the ball. He saw Suzanne arm in arm with her sister. both rushed to him and asked him to join in the first quadr with the Count de Latour-Yvelin. He was surprised.

"Why, who in the world is he?"

Suzanne answered mischievously: "He is a new friend my sister."

Rose blushed: "It's wrong of you to say that Suzanne. is no more my friend than yours."

The other smiled: "What a fib!"

Rose was annoyed. She turned her back on them and w off

Du Roy familiarly took hold of the young girl's elbow n him and in his caressing voice asked: "Listen, my dear chi do you believe me to be your friend?"

"Of course, I do, Bel-Ami."

"Do you trust me?"

"Completely."

"Do you remember what I was telling you a little wh ago?"

"What about?"

"About your marriage or rather the man who will man you."

" Yes."

"Well! Will you promise me just one thing?"

"Yes, but what is it?"

"That you will consult me every time anyone asks for yo hand and that you will not accept anyone without taking a

"Yes, I am quite willing."

"And that it will be a secret between the two of us. N a word to your father or your mother." " Not a word!"

"Will you swear it?"

"I swear it."

Rival came up importantly.

"Mademoiselle, your father wants you for the ball."

She said: "Come on then Bel-Ami," but he refused, decidto leave at once and think out various things alone. ds of new ideas were running through his mind as he looked but for his wife. He found her drinking chocolate in the flet with two gentlemen, strangers to him, to whom she sented her husband without naming them to him.

"Shall we go?" he asked her after a little while.

"As soon as you like," she added. "Where is la Patronne? gought to say good night to her."

Don't bother. She will only try to keep us for the ball, dIve had enough of it."

"That's true. Let's go."

They were silent all the way home; but, once inside, Madene said to him, smiling:

You don't know what a surprise I've got for you." He answered peevishly: "Well, what is it?"

"Guess."

"I can't bother to make the effort."

"Well, isn't to-morrow the first of January?" "Yes."

"Isn't that the time for New Year presents?" "Well?"

"Here is yours, which Laroche handed me just how." She handed him a little black box, looking like a jewel case. sopened it indifferently and saw the Cross of the Legion of mour. He went slightly pale, then smiled and said:
"I would have preferred ten millions. This didn't cost him

She had expected him to be overjoyed and was annoyed at slukewarm manner.

"Upon my word, you are really past belief. Nothing satiss you now-a-days."

He answered coolly: "The man's only paying his debt; and lowes me a great deal more than that."

His tone surprised her.

"It is a great honour to a man of your age."

"That's a matter of opinion. To-day, I could have more un that."

He took the case and placed it, open, on the mantel-she gazing for some moments at the brilliant star within. The he shut it up and with a shrug of the shoulders went to bed

The Gazette of the 1st January announced the nominati "of M Prosper-Georges du Roy, publicist, to the rank Chevalier of the Legion of Honour for exceptional service His surname was divided into two words, a fact which ga Georges more satisfaction even than the decoration itself.

An hour after reading the public announcement he receive a note from la Patronne inviting him to dine the same eveni with his wife to celebrate the event. The note was writt in ambiguous terms and he threw it into the fire. minutes' hesitation be said to Madeleine;

"We are dining this evening at the Walters,"

Astonished she remarked: "Really! But I thought y never wanted to set foot in their place again?" to which only answered: "Tve changed my mind."

They found la Patronne alone in the small Louis XVI boude adapted for small intimate parties. She was dressed in bla and had powdered her hair, making her look quite charmi She gave the impression from a distance of an old woman, nearer, of a young one. At close quarters even, she made attractive picture.

"Are you in mourning?" asked Madeleine, to which s replied sadly: "Yes and no. I have not actually lost anyo but I have reached the age when one does mourning for on life. To-day I wear mourning for the inauguration. Hend forth I shall wear it in my heart."

Du Roy thought: "Let's hope she sticks to it. But will she The dinner was a dreary one. Only Suzanne prattled i ceasingly. Rose seemed preoccupied. Everyone congratulat the journalist. The evening wore on, strolling through t grounds and chatting. Du Roy was bringing up the rear wi la Patronne when she clasped his arm.

"Listen," she said, lowering her voice..."I will never spec of this again, never...but come to see me...you see that never 'thee and thou' you now. But it is impossible to li without you...impossible. It is unimaginable torture... If ou...you are ever before my eyes, in my heart, in my flesh ay and night...It is as if you had made me drink poison hich is gnawing and devouring me within. I cannot go on... o, I cannot...I am quite willing to be nothing to you but an id woman...I have made my hair white to show you that, at come here, come sometimes, as a friend only.'

She had taken his hand, gripping it convulsively, hurting im, her nails digging into his flesh.

He answered composedly: "That's agreed. There's no use one over it all again. You see for yourself that I came to-day mediately I received your letter."

Walter, who was walking ahead with his two daughters and Madeleine, was waiting for du Roy by "Jesus walking on the waters."

"What d'you think?" he said, laughing, "yesterday, I found my wife on her knees before this picture as if she was in church.

She was saying her prayers here. How I laughed!"

Mme Walter replied in a voice surprisingly firm, vibrating with secret exaltation: "It is He, Christ who will save my soul. He gives me courage and renews my strength every time I look at him." and stopping before God upon the sea she murmured: "How beautiful He is! How they fear and love Him, those men! Look at the head, the eyes so human yet so divine!" She stood motionless, facing the Christ, her face as white as her white hair.

CHAPTER VIII

For the rest of the winter, the du Roys were frequent visitors at the Walter mansion, Georges often dining there alone, when Madeleine, pleading a headache, preferred to remain at home.

He had adopted Friday as a fixed date and la Patronne never asked anyone else on that evening. After dinner they played cards, or fed the Chinese fish, Georges living and behaving like one of the family. Occasionally behind clusters of ferns, or in odd corners, Mme Walter would suddenly clasp the young man in her arms, straining him to her breast with all her strength, whispering: "I love you... I love you... it is killing me!" He invariably repulsed her frigidly, answering curtly: "If you begin that all over again I shall stay away."

Towards the end of March rumour was busy with the marriage of both girls. Rose, it was said, was to marry the Count de Latour-Yvelin and Suzanne the Marquis de Cazolles. The two men haunted the house like familiar spirits and were accorded special favours and privileges. Georges and Suzanne lived a life of fraternal carefree intimacy, apparently remarkably pleased with themselves and making fun of everyone else. They never referred again to the girl's possible marriage, nor to the various suitors coming on the scene.

One morning, the director had brought du Roy home to lunch and Mme Walter, after the meal, was called away to attend to a tradesman.

"Come along," said Georges to Suzanne, "let's go and feed the goldfish," and each of them taking some bread, they made for the conservatory.

The whole length of the marble tank was strewn with cushions to enable onlookers to kneel by the goldfish and watch them swimming about. Each taking a cushion, they went on their knees side by side and leaning over the water, began to throw rolled up pellets of bread to the little red monsters who with their round, rolling protruding eyes, fat bodies, comical open mouths and quick darting movements, had a curious fascination. Georges and Suzanne were laughing at their own distorted reflections in the water.

Suddenly he said, lowering his voice:

"It's not fair to play the fool with me Suzanne."

"What do you mean, Bel-Ami?" the girl demanded.

"Do you remember what you promised me, here, on the evening of the fête?"

"No, what?"

"To consult me every time anyone asked for your hand."

"Well, what about it?"

"Someone has asked for it."

"Who has?"

"You know him quite well."
"No I don't. I swear I don't."

"Yes, you do know him. That long dandified fop, the Marquis de Cazolles."

"I don't think he is a fop at all."

"Very likely. Anyway he is a fool; ruined by gambling and worn out by dissipation. What an ideal match for you, who are so pretty, fresh, unspoilt and intelligent!"

She smiled and asked: "What is it you have against him?"

"I? Nothing at all."

"Yes, you have. He is nothing like as unattractive as you paint him."

"He is a fool and a knave."

She looked up from the water and turned to him. "What in the world is the matter with you?"

He answered, as if a secret was being dragged from the lepths of his heart. "The matter is...I am...I am...I am jealous of him."

She was surprised, but not offended. "You?"

"Yes, I."

"But why should you be jealous?"

"Because I am in love with you and you are quite well tware of it, little fraud that you are."

Her tone became severe: "You must be mad, Bel-Ami."

"Yes, I know I am-quite mad. Is it right for me, a married man to tell you, a young girl, a thing like that? I am more than mad, I am bad too, behaving like a blackguard. have no possible hope and the knowledge sends me crazy. And when I hear rumours of your getting married, I am so infuriat. ed I want to kill someone. You must forgive me Suzanne

He stopped. The fishes, not receiving any more bread were solemnly motionless, lined up like English soldiers stiffly on parade, staring at the two forms bending over them and no longer bothering about them.

Half wistfully, half chaffingly, the young girl murmured "It's a pity you are married. But what can be done about it? Not a thing. It's hopeless."

He turned abruptly to her, holding her eyes. "If I were free, would you marry me?"

She answered with frank sincerity: "Yes, I would Bel-Amig for I like you more than all the rest."

He rose to his feet and blurted out: "Thank you...thank you... I beg of you don't say 'yes' to anyone! Promise me! that."

Puzzled and uneasy she answered: "I promise."

Du Roy threw the bread pellet he was holding into the water and fled without another word, as if distraught.

Suzanne, anxious and worried, got up and walked quietly back to the salon. Du Roy had gone.

He went home, perfectly cool and collected. Madeleine was writing letters. He asked her: "Are you dining at the Walters on Friday? I'm going to, myself."

She hesitated: "No, I'm not too well. I shall take a rest and stay home."

He answered: "Just as you like. No one is forcing you."

He took his hat and went out.

For a long time past, he had been spying on her, watching her, following her, tracing all her movements. The hour to strike had come. He was not in the least deceived by her "I shall stay home."

He was particularly pleasant to her in the next few days, and put himself out to be unusually jovial and affectionate. Madeleine remarked on it: "Really you are becoming quite nice again."

On the Friday he dressed early to pay some calls, as he said, before dining at la Patronne's and set out towards six o'clock, and sought a cab in the Place Notre Dame de Lorette.

Before he left, he kissed his wife.

He found a cab and gave the coachman his orders: "You will stop in front of number 17, rue Fontaine and stay there until I tell you to drive on. Then you will take me at once the Coq-Faisan restaurant, rue Lafayette." The trundled off at a slow trot and du Roy lowered the blinds. Once outside his own door, he kept his eyes glued on it. had not long to wait. In ten minutes he saw Madeleine go out and set off towards the outer boulevards. He waited till she was out of sight and then put his head out of the window and told the cabby to drive on. The cab started off again and put him down before the Coq-Faisan, a second rate restaurant well known in the Quartier. Georges went into the main dining room and ordered a meal, eating slowly with his eye on his watch all the time. At half past seven, after finishing his coffee, drinking two glasses of dry champagne and smoking slowly an excellent cigar, he sauntered out, hailed another cab and made for the rue La Rochefoucauld. The cab stopped at house he had named, and without any inquiry of the concierge, he climbed to the third floor and knocked at the door of a flat. To the maid he said. "M Guibert de Lorme is at home. I believe?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

He was shown into the drawing room, where he was joined, a few seconds later by a tall gentleman, military looking, decorated and grey haired, though still young.

Du Roy greeted him and said: "As I told you, Monsieur commissioner of police, my wife is dining with her lover in the furnished flat they have taken in the rue des Martyrs."

The magistrate bowed: "I am at your service, Monsieur."

Georges inquired: "We have till nine o'clock, have we not?
After that time you cannot enter a private dwelling to obtain proof of adultery."

'The law is, Monsieur, seven o'clock in winter, nine o'clock after the 31st March. It is now the fifth April so we have up to nine."

"Very well, M Commissioner, I have a carriage waiting, we can take your orderlies and wait a little while outside the door, The later we go, the more chance we have of surprising them in the act."

"Just as you like, Monsieur."

The Commissioner left the room and returned, wearing an overcoat which concealed his tricoloured sash. He stood aside to allow du Roy to precede him; but the journalist, his mind preoccupied, refused to go out first, repeating: "After you... after you."

The magistrate, punctiliously insisted: "You first, Monsieur, I am in my own house." The other bowed and complied.

They went first to police headquarters to pick up three plain clothes constables who were already waiting, Georges having advised the Commissioner during the day, that the surprise would take place that evening. One of the men climbed up beside the coachman; the other two got inside the cab, which made for the rue des Martyrs.

Du Roy said: "I have a plan of the flat. It is on the second floor. We shall find first a small vestibule, then the bedroom, The three rooms are self-contained. There is only one exit, so escape will not be easy. There is a locksmith's shop a few yards away. I have arranged for the locksmith to be available."

It was still only a quarter after eight when they reached the house and they waited in silence more than twenty minutes. As the third quarter sounded Georges said: "Now let's go," and they climbed the staircase without bothering about the porter, who, in any case, had not seen them. One of the policemen remained in the street to watch the exit. At the second floor the four men halted and Georges applied his ear to the door, and then his eye to the keyhole. He heard and saw nothing. He sounded the bell.

The Commissioner said to his orderlies: "You wait here and come in, if I call you."

They waited. After a few minutes Georges rang the bell several times in succession. They heard a sound from the end of the room; then a light step drew near. Someone inside was trying to spy out the land. The journalist rapped sharply on the woodwork with his knuckles.

A voice, that of a woman trying to disguise itself demand-

The municipal officer answered: "Open in the name of the law."

The voice repeated: "Who are you?"

"I am the Commissioner of Police. Open, or I shall force mentrance."

The voice went on: "What is it you want?"

Du Roy exclaimed: "It's I. It's useless trying to escape us." The light footfalls, those of bare feet, died away, then after a few seconds returned.

Georges went on: "If you won't open the door, we are going to break it in." He gripped the brass door handle and three his weight against the door with his shoulder. There was no result at first, but, putting forth all his strength in one violent push, he succeeded in making the old decayed woodwork give way. There was a parting of locks and screws and he was thrown right against Madeleine standing in the antechamber, clad only in a chemise and petticoat, her limbs bare, a lighted candle in her hand.

He shouted: "That's the woman. We've got them," and dashed into the room; the Commissioner, removing his hat punctiliously, followed, and his wife quite staggered came behind them, lighting the way.

They passed through a dining room on the table of which were the scattered remains of a meal: empty champagne bottles, an open tin of foice gras, a fowl and some half eaten pieces of bread. On two plates, upon the dresser, were heaped up ovster shells.

The room looked as if it had been the scene of a fight. A woman's dress was flung across a chair and a man's trousers thrown easually across a couch. Four shoes, two large and two small, lay on their sides at the foot of the bed. It was a third rate furnished flat shabbily upholstered, full of that repulsive rancid odour peculiar to that class of dwelling, pervading the curtains, bedding, walls and chairs, the odour of people who had slept or lived in it for a day, a week or six months and had left behind them something of themselves, the scent of human beings which added to that of their predecessors had formed in course of time that vague repulsive unbearable stench typical of such places. A plate of cakes, a bottle of chartreuse and two wine glasses, still half full, were on the mantel-shelf. The bronze clock was hidden beneath a man's tall hat.

The Commissioner turned to Madeleine and eyed her keenly, "You are Mme Claire Madeleine du Roy, lawful wife of M Prosper-Georges du Roy, publicist, here present?"

She made no reply.

The Magistrate went on: "What are you doing here? I find you, away from your home, practically naked in a furnished flat. For what purpose have you come here?" He waited a few moments for a reply, then as she was still silent, warned her: "If you refuse to make a statement Madame, I shall be compelled to record the fact."

On the bed, concealed by a blanket, lay a motionless form.

The Commissioner walked across: "Monsieur?"

The man lying on the bed did not move. He appeared to have his back turned to them and his head was buried in the pillows.

The officer touched what was apparently his shoulder:

"Monsieur, I advise you not to use force."

But the concealed body remained as motionless as the dead. Du Roy stepped forward and with a sharp jerk, ripped away the covering and snatched off the pillows disclosing the livid face of M Laroche-Mathieu. He leaned over him, trembling with the desire to cut his throat or throttle him and snarled between closed teeth: "At least, have the courage of your infamy."

The Magistrate demanded: "Who are you?" and the discomfited lover not replying, added: "I am the Commissioner of Police and I order you to tell me your name."

Georges, who was shaking with animal rage, shouted: "An-wer, you cur, or I'll name you myself."

The man on the bod mumbled something at last: "Monsieur to Commissioner you have no right to allow me to be insulted y this individual. Am I in your charge or his? Must I answer im or you?"

He seemed to have no saliva in his mouth.

The officer replied: "Answer me Monsieur and me alone. I emand that you state who you are."

The other was silent. He clutched the blanket tightly up his neck and rolled his paniestricken eyes. His tiny remussé moustache looked jet black against his dead white skin. The Commissioner resumed: "If you decline to reply I shall proced to arrest you. In any case get up. I will interrept you when you are dressed."

The body twisted about in the bed and the head muttered:

But I can't get up."

"Why not?" demanded the Magistrate.

The other bleated: "Because...because I am quite naked." Du Roy laughed loudly and picking up a chemise which was ving on the ground, threw it on the bed.

"Come along...get up...since you don't mind taking your bothes off before my wife, you can put them on again before ne.''

He turned his back and walked to the chimney.

Madeleine had recovered her usual poise and realizing that all was lost, was ready to dare anything. Her eyes were bright with reckless audacity and bravado. Rolling a piece of paper the coolly lighted, as if for a reception, all the ten candles in the tawdry candelabra on the mantelpiece and then leaned casually against it and stretching one of her bare feet to the dying fire and, nonchalantly hitching up her petticoat which had slipped down over her thighs, she took a eigarette from a little pink box, lighted it and composedly bogan to smoke.

The Commissioner had turned to her while her paramour was dressing. She twitted him insolently: "Do you often play this part Monsieur?"

He answered gravely: "As seldom as possible Madame." She smiled at him sardonically: "I am glad to hear it. It is hardly proper, you know."

She took not the least notice of her husband and affected not to see him.

The gentleman of the bed was now dressed. He had put or his trousers, donned his waistcoat and now walked across fastening the buttons.

The police chief turned to him, "Now, Monsieur, be good enough to tell me who you are."

The other said not a word.

"Very well. You force me to arrest you."

At that, the man exclaimed sharply: "You can't lay finger on me. I am immune from arrest on civil process."

Du Roy leaped at him as if he was going to knock him down "It is the flagrant act," he shouted, "the flagrant act of adultery. I can have you arrested, if I like...and I do like," then added: "This man calls himself Laroche-Mathieu Minister of Foreign Affairs."

The Commissioner drew back, astounded. "Is that true Monsieur? Are you or are you not going to say who you are?''

The man pulled himself together. "For once," he said for cibly, "that miserable cad there has not lied. I am Laroche Mathieu, the Minister." Then pointing to Georges' breast, or which a small red patch stood out like a flame, he sneered "And even now the blackguard is wearing on his coat the cross of honour that I gave him."

Du Roy became livid. With a lightning gesture he snatched the bright red ribbon from his buttonhole and flung it into the fireplace: "There you are, that's what a decoration is worth which comes from a swine like you."

They were facing one another with elenched fists, both infuriated, at breaking point.

The Commissioner stepped between them quickly and for cibly held them apart. "Come gentlemen," he said peremptorily, "this is legal process, behave yourselves."

They quietened down and turned their backs to each other Madeleine, motionless and smiling amusedly, calmly went out smoking.

The official proceeded to a formal charge: "Monsieur the finister, I have surprised you, alone with Mme du Roy here pesent, you in a bed, she nearly naked, your clothing thrown pellmell across the room. That constitutes the flagrant act of dultery. You cannot deny the evidence. Have you anything a say?"

Laroche-Mathieu muttered: "I have nothing to say. Do your duty. '

The Commissioner addressed Madeleine: "Do you admit, Madame, that this gentleman is your lover?"

She answered fearlessly: "I don't deny it. He is my wer."

"That is sufficient,"

The Magistrate was proceeding to make some formal notes on the state and disposition of the flat and was just finishing when the minister who was now fully dressed and stood waiting with his overcoat over his arm and his hat in his hand asked: "Have you any further need of my presence, Monsieur? What do I do now? May I go?"

Du Roy answered him, smiling insolently: "Why go? We have finished. You can go to bed again, Monsieur; we are going to leave you alone together."

He touched the Commissioner's arm.

"Let us retire, Monsieur Commissioner, we have nothing further to do in this place."

Rather surprised, the Magistrate was following him out; on the threshold Georges halted to give him precedence. The other courteously refused. Du Roy insisted: "Pass, Monsieur," to which the Commissioner replied: "After you."

The journalist saluted him and said with ironical formality:
"It is your turn now, Monsieur Commissioner. I am practically in my own home here."

Then he quietly closed the door with an air of exaggerated discretion. An hour later Georges du Roy walked into the editorial sanetum of la Vie Française.

M Walter was already there for he still directed and controlled the paper which had enormously increased its circulation and was a powerful support for the grandiose operations of his bank. He looked up: "So there you are. You're looking rather queer. Why didn't you come to dinner at the house? Where have you been?"

The young man, sure of his effect, announced, emphasizing every syllable: "I have been throwing out the Minister of Foreign Affairs."

Walter thought he was joking. "What do you mean, throwing out?"

"I have altered the Cabinet. That's all. It was about time to get rid of that carrion."

The old man was bewildered and thought that his political editor was drunk. "Now, now, talk sense."

"That's exactly what I am doing. I have just surprise M Laroche-Mathieu in the flagrant act of adultery with my wife. The Commissioner of Police has formally charged him with the offence. The Minister is down the drain."

The amazed director, mechanically took off his spectacles

"You are not making a fool of me?"

"Certainly not. I'm about to make a news item of the

"But, what do you intend to do about it?"

"To smash that cheat and liar and public swindler."

Georges threw his hat on a chair and went on: "Let thos look to themselves who get in my way. I never forgive."

The director was still at sea. "But...what about you wife?"

"My divorce petition will be filed to-morrow morning, am returning her to the late lamented Forestier."

"Do you really want to divorce her?"

"Most certainly. She has made me ridiculous. But I had to play the part of a fool to eaten them out. Well, I've done it; and, now I am master of the situation."

The director had not yet collected all his wits. He looked at du Roy with wary eyes, thinking: "I must watch him; he'

a fellow to be careful of."

Georges went on: "I'm now a free man...I have a certain fortune...I shall stand at the General Election in October for my own province where I am well-known. I could not be andidate, or expect any support with that woman who was uspect on all sides. She took me in, fool that I was, cajoled, not round me and hooked me. But since I found out what her game was I watched her, the bitch."

He began to laugh: "It was that poor Forestier who was the cuckold...trusting, tranquil, betrayed without a suspicion of it. Well, I've rid myself of the scab that he bequeathed to me. Now I shall go far.' He sat down, legs astraddle across a chair and repeated thoughtfully: "Yes, I shall go far."

And Daddy Walter, peering curiously at him, his spectacles nushed up to his forehead, muttered to himself: "Yes, he will go far, the blackguard."

Georges rose. "Well, I'm off to make a column or two of tt. It will have to be done discreetly. But you know the Minister is done for. He is a man in the sea; and no one can fish him out again. La Vie Française has no further use for his services."

The old man hesitated a little, then decided to take his side. "Agreed," said he. "And so much the worse for those who mix up pleasure with business."

CHAPTER IX

THREE months had passed. Du Roy's divorce had been granted. His wife had resumed the name of Forestier. The Walters were leaving for Trouville on 15th July and had arranged for a day in the country before their departure. The chose a Thursday for the outing, and, at nine o'clock, on fine morning set out in a gorgeous coach and four with seat for six persons.

Lunch was to be at Saint-Germain in the Henri IV pavilion Bel-Ami, unable to endure the presence of the Marquis de Cazolles had stipulated that he should be the only man in the party, but at the last moment it was decided that the Cour de Latour-Yvelin should be included, and he was invited on the evening before.

The coach set off at a smart trot down the avenue de Champs-Elysées, then across the bois de Boulogne.

It was ideal summer weather, not too hot. Across the blue sky, the swallows traced long gracefully curving lines that one imagined one saw after they had passed.

The three ladies sat at the back of the coach, with the three men facing them, Walter between his two guests.

They crossed the Seine, went round Mount Valérien to Bougival, then followed the river to Pecq. The Count d Latour-Yvelin, a rather worn out looking gentleman with long fair beard which the slightest breeze ruffled gazed tenderly at Rose; they had been engaged one month. Georges' eye continually sought Suzanne's; they were both very pale. The eyes met in quick fugitive understanding glances, seeming t exchange secret thoughts. Mme Walter was serenely happy It was a long boring lunch and after it, Georges suggested : walk on the terrace.

Georges and Suzame brought up the rear; as soon as the others were out of hearing he said in low tense tones: "Suzam I adore you. I am mad about you."

She whispered: "I too, Bel-Ami."

"If I can't have you for my wife, I will leave Paris and this

"Then ask papa's consent," she answered; "he might give

He shook his head impatiently: "No, I tell you, for the enth time, that would be useless. He will shut his door is my face; he will dismiss me from the paper; and we shall not he able even to see one another. That's the precise answer I should get to a formal proposal. They have promised you to the Marquis de Cazolles, hoping that in the end you will give in and say 'yes.' That's what they're waiting for and what they anticipate."

"What can we do then?"

He hesitated, looking away from her.

"Do you love me enough to do something reckless?"

"Yes."

"Very reckless?"

"Yes."

"The most reckless thing possible?"

"Yes."

"Would you have the pluck to defy your father and your mother?"

" Yes."

"Honestly?"

" Yes."

"Well! There is one way and one way only. It is something that must come from you, not from me. You are a spoilt child, allowed to say anything, and they will not be surprised at anything you do, however daring and audacious. Listen carefully. When you get back this evening you must seek out your mother first, and get her quite alone. And you must tell her, straight out, that you want to marry me. She will be tremendously upset and terribly angry..."

Suzanne interrupted: "Oh no! Mamma will be in favour of it."

He said sharply: "Nothing of the kind. You don't know her. She will be far more astonished and furious than your father. You will see how she will refuse. But you keep firm, don't yield an inch; stick to it that you will marry me, only me, and no one else but me. Will you do it?"

"I will do it."

"Then, leave your mother and go to your father and tell him the same thing. Be very serious and absolutely determined."

"Yes, yes. And then?"

"And then—this is where the matter becomes really grave. If you have made up your mind and are resolute, quite resolute, quite, quite, quite, determined to be my wife, my dear, dear little Suzanne... I will... I will take you away."

She was in raptures and clapped her hands delightedly: "Oh! What happiness! How heavenly! You will take me away! When will you?"

All the age-old poesy of nocturnal clopements, post-chaises, wayside hostelries, all the exciting romantic adventures of song and story passed through the young girl's mind in a flash like a fairy tale come true. She repeated: "When will you take me away?"

Very softly he told her: "This evening...to-night."

She began to tremble a little: "And where shall we run away to?",

"Ah! That is my secret. Reflect carefully on what you are doing. Remember that, after this flight you will have to be my wife! It is the only way but it is...it is very dangerous... for you."

She declared: "I have decided...where shall I meet you?"

"Will you be able to leave the house unnoticed?"

"Yes, I will go out by the little side door."

"Good! When the concierge has gone to bed, towards midnight join me in the Place de la Concorde. You will find me in a cab, drawn up outside the Ministry of Marine."

"I will be there."

"Truly?"

"Word of honour!"

He took her hand and pressed it: "How I love you! How good and brave you are! So you don't want to marry M de Cazolles?"

I don't."

was very annoyed when you said no?"
Indeed, he wanted to send me back to the

and you will have to be determined?"

he vast horizon, enraptured at this idea of an would be going beyond it...with him...she off...she was proud of it...Not a thought f her reputation, of any possible disgrace. Did such things or have the least inkling of them? k.

you are my pet," said Mme Walter. "What ping with Bel-Ami?"

the others and the conversation turned to the ould soon be enjoying.

nck, through the Chatou Road, Georges was houghtful. If this child had a little courage, succeed after all! For the past three months ring the spell of his irresistible charm around scinated her, captivated her, conquered her. love him, he who knew so well how to make Without the least difficulty he had plucked t of a doll. It was his doing that she had zolles. It was his doing, that she was now ith him. It was the only way.

ne well knew, would never consent under any zer to give him her daughter. She loved him vould love him, with intractable violence. He sounds by calculated coldness but he realized e she was consumed by impotent, starving hopeless to think of persuading her. Never to his taking Suzanne. But once he had the at a distance he could negotiate with the with an all powerful weapon in his hand, is mind he answered absentmindedly anything him and was abstracted and thoughtful until its again. Suzanne too was preoccupied and he regular sound of the four horses trotting raised vision of proad endless highways, of moonlight eternally bright, of road side inns, of eager postboys rushing to change horses, of lover leeing and pursued.

At last the coach pulled up in the courtyard and Georges was pressed to stay to dinner. He refused and went home

After a scanty meal he put his papers in order as if preparing for a long absence, destroying compromising letters, hiding others, and writing to a few friends.

Occasionally he glanced at the clock, thinking: "She's retting ready now." He became nervous and uneasy. What if the plan miscarried? Well, if it did he had little to fear the would wriggle out of it somehow. He was playing for a very high stake that evening, one well worth a risk! At elevening left the house, wandered about for a time and then taking a cab to the Place de la Concorde, waited, inside it, outside the Ministry of Marine. As midnight approached he grew everishly impatient, lighting match after match to see the time, every other minute peering out of the window to scanhe street.

A distant clock struck twelve, then another nearer, two ogether and finally last one, far away; as the sounds died lown, he muttered: "It's all over. It's misfired. She isn't oming."

None the less he intended to wait till daybreak; the occasion called for patience.

He heard the first quarter sound, the half hour, three quarters. Then, one after the other, all the clocks sounded one o'clock as they had proclaimed midnight. He could only wait, trying, with growing uneasiness, to guess what had gone wrong.

Suddenly a woman's face appeared at the window.

" Are you there Bel-Ami?"

For one suffocating moment his heart stopped heating.

"Is it you Suzanne?"

"Yes. It is I."

He was so excited he could hardly turn the door handle.

"Ah! It is you...it is you...come."

She entered and collapsed in a heap at his side. A sharp and to the coachman and the cab started off.

Eagerly he demanded: "Tell me Suzanne, what happened?" The girl was gasping for breath and could not speak. At it she said faintly: "Oh! It has been ghastly...especially the mamma."

He was scared and greatly perturbed. "Your mother?

hat did she say? Tell me."

She has been frightful. I went to her room and " Oh! cited my little piece which I had prepared, word for word. be went as white as a sheet and cried: 'Never! Never!' Then wept, I stormed, I swore I could never marry anyone but n. I really thought she was going to beat me. She seemed go quite mad; she screamed that she would send me back the convent to-morrow. I have never seen her like it. never. could not believe my eyes. Papa must have heard her abuse id insults, and he came in. He was nothing like so frantic she was but he, too, refused. He said you were not a good rough match. They went on and on and finally I became vsterical too and screamed louder than both of them. apa ordered me off to bed with a melodramatic air which idn't suit him at all. That settled it. I decided to come to ou, and here I am. Where do we go now?"

He had gently loosened her dress, listening intently with eating heart, sharp hatred growing against both of them. But e had their daughter. Very soon they should see.

He answered: "It is too late to catch the train. This arriage will take us as far as Sèvres where we will spend the ight. To-morrow we will make for La Roche-Guyon. It's a retty little village on the banks of the Seine between Mantes and Bonnières."

"I have brought nothing with me. Not a thing." He smiled carelessly: "That's all right. We'll arrange all hat."

The cab rolled on through the streets. Georges took the roung girl's hand, kissing it, slowly and with careful respect. Iimself hardly accustomed to strictly platonic affairs he didn't frow how to talk to her. Suddenly he saw the child was weeping. He asked her anxiously: "What is the matter, little one?"

She answered tearfully: "I'm thinking of my poor mamma. She won't be able to sleep, if she found out I've ran away."

Her mother was indeed unable to sleep.

As soon as Suzaime had left the room, she had turned to her husband, completely distracted.

"My God! What are we to make of it all?"

Walter shouted furiously: "We are to make of it that this trickster has got round her; that it was he who persuaded her to refuse Cazolles. He finds her dowry a fat one, damp him!"

He stamped angrily up and down the room: "You led him on all the time. You, with your flattery, your making up to him, your ceaseless chatter about him. It was Bel-Ami this Bel-Ami that, from morning till night. Now we've got to pay for it."

White faced, she murmured: "I?...I led him on?"

"Yes," he bellowed. "You! You were all mad on him, you, la Marelle, Suzanne and the others. Do you think that I didn't see that you couldn't let even a couple of days pass without making him come here?"

She drew herself up scornfully: "I will not allow you to speak to me like that. You forget that I was not dragged up as you were, in a shop."

He stopped short and looked at her incredulously, then with a furious "Nom de Dieu!" flung out of the room slamming the door after him.

Left alone, she went, instinctively to the mirror to look at herself to see if anything had changed in her through these strange, impossible, monstrous happenings. Suzanne in love with Bel-Ami. And Bel-Ami wanting to marry Suzanne! No! Not the latter. She refused to believe it. It could not be true. The child had quite naturally become infatuated with an attractive young man and hoped she would be allowed to marry him; she had thrown her little bombshell and that was that. But he? He could not have been a party to it! She thought it out from all sides, as one does in the face of overhelming disaster. No, Bel-Ami could not have known of nzanne's escapade.

For a long while she pondered over his possible treachery r innocence. What a wretch he was, if it was he who had equally prepared the blow! And what would come of it? That dangers and agonies lay ahead!

If he was in ignorance of the whole thing, then everything ould be settled. They would take Suzanne away for a six nonths' sea voyage and that would be the end of it. But what bout herself? How could she possibly see him again after Ithis? For she would always love him. Passion had entered er like one of those barbed arrows that can never be drawn nt. Life without him was impossible. Better to die.

Her thoughts bewildered her in their anguish and uncerainty. The effort of concentration made her head swim; her deas were becoming confused, physically painful, wandering. the searching, probing, the lack of knowing anything, the meertainty began to unnerve her.

She looked at her watch; it was past one o'clock. She nuttered: "I can't stay here doing nothing. I shall go mad.

[must wake Suzanne and question her."

She went candle in hand and barefooted not to make a noise, b her daughter's room; opened the door quietly and looked at the bed. It was neatly made. She could not take it in at first and told herself that the girl was talking things over with her father; but a terrible suspicion held her in its grip and she sped to her husband's room. She was there in a flash, white and trembling.

Walter was in bed, reading. He looked up, startled.

"Well? What is it? What's the trouble now?"

"Have you seen Suzanne?"

"I? No, of course not. Why?"

"She's . . . she's gone . . . she is not in her room."

With one bound he leapt out of bed, shuffled into his slippers and his night shirt ludicrously flapping in the breeze, was off down the corridor in his turn to his daughter's room.

One glance inside and there was no room for doubt.

child had fled.

He fell into a chair, his lighted lamp on the ground by his side.

His wife came in after him. "Well?"

He hardly had the strength to answer her. He was no longer even angry.

He groaned: "It is all over. He has her. We are lost." She didn't understand: "What do you mean, lost?"

"Parbleu, isn't it obvious? He will have to marry her now."

She uttered a queer sharp animal-like scream. "He Never! You must be crazy!"

He answered sorrowfully: "It's no use screaming. He has taken her away, he has dishonoured her. The best thing now is to give her to him. If we are careful no one need ever know of this."

She was shaking with terrible emotion. "Never! Never! Never! Never will I give my consent. He shall never have Suzanne!"

Walter answered dejectedly: "But he has her. It is done And now he will keep her and hide her till we give in. So there is only one thing to do. (live in now and save a public scandal."

Torn by grief she dared not own, she repeated: "No! No! I will never agree."

Impatiently he took her up: "Can't you see, there is nothing to discuss? It is unavoidable now. We have no choice. Ah The swine, how he has fooled us...but, all the same he's clever there's no denying that. We could have found many a better match for her certainly, as regards position but not as regards wits and a future. He is a coming man. He will be deputy and minister."

His wife reiterated with fanatical resolve: "Never...I will not allow that man to marry Suzanne. You hear what I say... Never!"

Her implacable resistance exasperated him and as a man of common sense he ended by taking up the cudgels on Bel-Ami's behalf.

"For heaven's sake be sensible...! repeat marriage is now necessary...absolutely imperative. Besides, who knows? We may not regret it, after all. With a man of his calibre, one pever knows what he will attain to. You saw yourself how, in three articles he toppled over that clown Laroche-Mathieu and how cleverly and with what dignity he behaved in a very difficult situation for a husband. Anyhow we shall see. The plain fact is we are caught and we can't get ourselves out of it." She wanted to scream, roll on the ground, tear her hair; she repeated incessantly: "He shall not have her. I will not allow it."

Walter rose and took up his lamp. "You're a fool, like the rest of your sex. Can't you see these hysteries get you nowhere? You don't know how to accept the inevitable... you're just being stupid! I tell you he has got to marry her. There is no way out of it."

He left her, pulling on his drawers as he went, and like a comic ghost vanished in the long corridor of the vast sleeping mansion making quietly for his bedroom.

His wife remained motionless racked by unbearable grief. Even now she could not take it in. She only knew she was in agony. She felt she could not stay there, alone, till daybreak. She must save her reason somehow, run away, go out, seek help, be comforted. She tried to think whom to send for, some man. There was none. A priest? Yes, that was it, a priest. She would throw berself at his feet and admit everything, confess her sin and her despair. He would understand that the wicked wretch must not marry Suzanne and would prevent it.

She must go at once. But where could she find a priest at that hour? Where could she go? To stay still was impossible.

Sudderly, the serene vision of Jesus walking on the sea, passed before her eyes. He seemed to be calling her, to be saving:

"Come unto me and I will give you rest."

Taking her candle she made for the conservatory. The painting was in a little alcove enclosed by a glass door to protect it from the effects of the damp ground, a kind of chapel in a miniature forest of strange foliage.

Entering the winter garden, which previously she had only seen illuminated. Mme Walter was startled by its gloomy darkness. The atmosphere was heavy with the sickening seed of exotic Eastern plants; and, all the doors being closed, the perfumed air shut in under the glass roof, entered the lung with a deadening drugged lassitude which was half pleasure and half pain, imparting to the flesh a strange sensation of ene vating voluptuousness and death.

The poor woman stumbled along, frightened by the shadov of weird plants which seemed, in the flickering light of the candle, like trembling monsters and ghosts of strange mi shapen beings.

Suddenly she saw the Christ and opening the dividing doc she fell on her knees.

At first she prayed with the perfervid abandonment of lost soul, babbling frantic desperate invocations, then, becoming a little calmer she raised her eyes full of anguish.

She faltered: "Jesus! Jesus!" but it was the nar

"Georges" which came to her lips.

The thought struck her like a blow, that at this very momer Georges, perhaps was possessing her daughter. He was alo with her, somewhere in a room. He! He! with Suzanne,

She repeated: "Jesus!...Jesus!" but she was thinking them...of her daughter and her lover! She saw them plainly that they might have been there before her, in the place of the picture. They were in a room...lt was night like were smiling...in each other's arms. The room we dark...the bedclothes thrown back. She strove to go to the ...to grip her daughter by the hair and tear her from the embrace. She tried to seize her by the throat to strangle he this daughter whom she hated, who was giving herself to the man.

She uttered a piercing scream and fell to the ground.

The next day they found her lying unconscious, almo asphyxiated before "Jesus walking on the water." She w so ill, that she nearly died. It was not for some days the her reason returned. Then came the relief of tears.

Suzanne's disappearance was accounted for to the servar by the explanation that she had suddenly been sent back the convent. And M Walter replied to a long letter from In Roy by according him his daughter's hand.

Bel-Ami had posted this epistle the moment they left Paris, having written it out in readiness the same evening. In it he said in conciliatory terms, that he had long loved the girl, that there had been no understanding between them but as she had come to him of her own accord and said: "I will be your wife," he had considered himself justified in keeping her with him and even in concealing her until he had obtained a reply from her parents whose legal consent he valued less than the willingness of his fiancée herself.

He asked M Walter to reply to the poste restante, telling him a friend had undertaken to deliver the letter to him.

When he had secured what he wanted he brought Suzanne back to Paris and sent her back to her parents, taking care to keep away himself, for the time.

They had spent six days by the side of the Seine.

Never had the girl enjoyed herself so much. She had played at being a country maid. He had passed her off as his sister and they lived in a free and easy chaste intimacy, a kind of affectionate comradeship. He thought it prudent to respect her. On the morrow of their arrival she had bought and decked herself out in rustic clothes including an enormous straw hat trimmed with wild flowers. She loved the country and they spent their time fishing, inspecting the ancient castle and its wonderful tapestries, with pienics in the meadows by the banks of the river or on the river itself, Georges in quaint ready-made country attire. There were frequent hurried tremulous embraces on her part completely innocent, on his, full of temptation. But he knew how to restrain himself; and when he told her: "We must go back to Paris to-morrow, your father has given me your hand;" the child answered artlessly: "Already? it has been quite nice, being your wife!"

CHAPTER X

It was dark in the little flat in the rue de Constantinople Georges du Roy and Clotilde de Marelle had met outside the door and she had gone quickly inside and without giving him time even to raise the venetians had attacked him. "So you are engaged to Suzanne Walter?"

He coolly admitted the fact. "Didn't you know?"

She was furiously indignant. "You, engaged to Suzanne Walter! That's too much! Altogether too much! For three months you have fooled me and kept it to yourself. The whole world knew it except myself! And now my husband tells me of it!"

Du Roy started laughing, a little uneasily, and putting his hand on the mantel-shelf sat down.

She stared at him with gathering rage: "You have been preparing this blow ever since you left your wife, and you have been keeping me on as your mistress, just to pass the interval. What an unspeakable cad you are!"

He asked blandly: "Why? I had a wife who was deceiving me, I found her out; I have taken a divorce and I marry an other woman. What could be more natural?"

She began to tremble: "Oh! How cunning you are and dangerous!"

He smiled: "Idiots and fools are made to be duped!"

"How could I have failed to see through you from the beginning! But, no I could not guess you would be such a villain as that! Not even you!"

His pose became dignified. "I must ask you to be careful what you say."

His assumed indignation disgusted her.

"What! So I am to be careful what I say now! You be have to me like a scoundrel and I am to say nothing! You car swindle everyone, exploit everyone, take your pleasure and your money right and left, and you expect me to treat you as if you were an honest man!"

He rose, his lip trembling. "Be quiet or I must ask you in leave."

"To leave...to leave...you must ask me to leave...you...

ton!" She was nearly suffocating with rage and could hardly speak. After a little, as if the gates of her wrath had crashed spen, she screamed: "To leave...you forget that I am the one who has paid for this flat from the very first day...Ah!
Yes, you have bragged about taking it over yourself from time to time.... But whose flat is it?... It is mine..who has paid the rent to keep it on... I have....And so I am to clear out.... Be quiet you wretch!.... Do you think I don't know how you stole from Madeleine half the Vaudree legacy?
Do you think I don't know that you went to bed with Suzanne to force her to marry you?...?

He gripped her shoulders and shook her: "Don't you dare to say that. I warn you."

"You slept with her; I know you did."

He had put up with the rest of her abuse but this lie infuriated him. The hometruths that she had shrieked in his face had merely irritated him, but the falsehood about the child, who was to become his wife made him long to strike her.

He warned her again: "Shut up...take care...shut up!"

He was shaking like a branch being shaken for its fruit.

With hair awry, mouth wide open, eyes frenzied, she screamed again, "You slept with her!"

He loosened his grip on her and knocked her down. Even then, crouched against the wall and lifting herself on her hands she repeated again and again, "You slept with her!"

He rushed at her, pulled her to her feet and holding her off with one hand, struck her with the other as if she had been a man.

She was silent now, moaning under his blows. She was no longer standing but sank to the ground, trying to shield her body in the angle of the wall and the floor, weeping pitifully.

The rain of blows ceased and he drew away, walking sharply up and down the room, trying to pull himself together. Going into the bedroom he took a jug of cold water and bathed his head, then returned carefully drying his hands, to see what she was doing.

She had not moved and was still stretched on the ground sobbing quietly.

He demanded: "Will you have finished your blubbering soon?"

She made no reply; and he stood in the middle of the room a little embarrassed and ashamed, her body prostrate before him.

Suddenly he came to a decision and took his hat from the mantel-shelf, "Good evening. You can give the key to the concierge, when you are ready. I'm not going to wait your convenience."

He left and, shutting the door, sought the caretaker in his lodge. "Madame is resting. She will be leaving presently." Inform the landlord that I am giving notice to quit on the 1st October. It is now the 16th August, so that is amp 1ϵ notice."

He went off briskly, recollecting that the summer sales afforded an excellent opportunity for some bargain purchases for the approaching wedding.

It was fixed for the 20th October, immediately after the reopening of the Assembly; and was to take place at the Madeleine Church. There had been much speculation about the marriage without anyone knowing the actual facts Various stories were current; there had been talk of an clope ment but nothing definite had leaked out.

The rumour amongst the domesties was that Mme Walter who now completely ignored her future son-in-law, had beer bitterly opposed to the match and, on the evening on which it had been decided, had spirited her daughter away to the convent at midnight.

She had almost died; and, certainly would never be her former self again. She looked an old woman now; her hair had become quite grey; she had fallen back on her religion and attended mass regularly.

Early in September, the Vic Française announced that th Baron du Roy de Cantel had become its editor-in-chief.

M Walter retaining the title of Managing Director.

enlisted the services of an army of columnists, littératical experts and art and dramatic critics all of the and all suborned by the lure of money from the established dailies.

journalists, owners of famous and revered names no ugged contemptuous shoulders at the mention of the aise: its swift and overwhelming success had silenced of hostile critics.

rriage of its editor-in-chief was one of the events risian season, for Georges du Roy and the Walters ome time past been the objects of lively curiosity. whom they had flattered in the paper's society ad promised to attend.

nt took place on a clear autumn day.

ight o'clock in the morning a large red carpet, laid stone steps leading to the great west door of the 'oclaimed to the people of Paris that a great ceremony te place.

in their way to office, little milliners and shop stopped and looked, vaguely wondering why rich ent so much money, just to become coupled.

s ten o'clock the curious began to loiter round, stayfew minutes in the hope that, perhaps, the show was begin, and then going their ways.

en, a squad of police sergeants appeared and began on the rapidly growing crowd, increasing every Then came the first arrivals amongst the guests, d to get good seats. They appropriated the end chairs ddle aisle of the great nave. Little by little came omen with rustle of silks and satins, solemn faced ly all bald, walking with that unctuous smug gravity by considered appropriate to the place.

urch slowly filled. A ray of sunlight through the n doors shone on the nearest rows of seated guests. oir which seemed rather sombre, the yellow glow of candles flickered, humble and pallid before this track of the sun. There were greetings, beckonings, into groups. The literary men, with less reverence than their society prototypes, chatted in undertones and looked at the women.

Norbert de Varenne, seeking a friend to talk to, saw Jacques Rival, towards the middle of a row of chairs, and joined him.

"Well! Well!" said he. "The future is to the sly!" The other man, whose disposition was not an envious one, answered genially. "And good luck to him! His future is made."

Rival asked: "Have you any idea, what has become of his wife?"

The poet smiled: "Yes and no. They tell me she is living very quietly in the Montmartre district. But...there is always a but'...a little while ago, I read in the Plume a series of very able political articles which bore an uncanny resemblance to those of Forestier and du Roy. They were under the name of Jean le Dol, a rather intelligent young bachelor of the same race as our friend Georges, who has made the acquaintance of his former wife. From which I conclude that she has a fancy for novices and always will have. Anyway, she is very wealthy, you know. She didn't receive the attentions of Vaudree and Laroche-Mathieu for nothing."

Rival answered: "She is not at all a bad sort, that little Madeleine. Very astute and very elever. She must look charming undressed: But, tell me how has du Roy managed to get married in church after getting a divorce?"

"He is being married in church, because, in the eyes of the Church, the first marriage was no marriage at all."

" What does that mean!"

"Our Bel-Ami, either through indifference or to save expense, considered the registry office sufficient when he married Madeleine Forestier. He dispensed with any ecclesiastical sanction and, therefore to our Holy Mother the Church, was simply living in sin. Consequently he appears before her to-day as a bachelor and she is ready to bless him with all her pomp and circumstance, at the expense and cost of Daddy Walter."

The noise of the crowd was growing, voices were raised almost to conversation pitch. Celebrities posed and postured, pushing themselves well in the limelight, carefully displaying their practised poise before the public, skilled in exhibitionism at all social functions at which they were, in their own opinion, the indispensable ornaments, the showpieces, the mainstays.

"Another thing," asked Rival, "you often call on the director, is it true that Mme Walter and du Roy are not on speaking terms?"

"Quite true. She didn't want to give the child to him, fle had some hold over the father and threatened to disinter some dry bones, possibly those of the corpses killed in Morocco. Walter remembered the example of Laroche-Mathieu and threw up the sponge at once. But the mother, obstinate like all women, swore that she would never again speak a word to her son-in-law. It is really comical to see them together. She looks like a statue, the statue of Vengeance and he looks like a clown, though, mind you, he has a thick skin and knows how to carry it off."

Colleagues came up to them and shook hands. Fragments of political gossip became audible. And like the murmur of a distant sea, the rumbling of the crowd massed in front of the church, reached them, through the door, ascending to the vaulted roof and drowning the more discreetly modulated chatter of the élite of society within the church. Suddenly the head verger struck the ground three times with his halberd. The whole congregation turned round with a prolonged rustle of frocks and scraping of chairs. The young girl appeared on her father's arm in the bright light of the main doors.

She looked like a plaything, a lovely delicate white toy, her hair wreathed in orange blossoms.

For a moment she stood still on the threshold, then, as she took her first step into the nave the organ thundered forth a joyous welcome to the bride-to-be.

"She came forward, her head bowed, not exactly timidly but raguely startled, gentle, altogether charming, a tiny bride in miniature. The women smiled and murmured admiringly as she passed. The men said approvingly. "Exquisite, adorable!"

M Walter walked, or rather, marched along with ponderous, exaggerated dignity, his spectacles firmly planted on his nose. Behind them, four bridesmaids, all in pink and all remarkably pretty formed a court for this little gent of a quee Their male escorts, carefully chosen and conforming to type strode along with regular automatic gait, as if they were under the baton of a ballet master.

Mme Walter came next, giving her arm to the Marquis d' Latour-Yvelin, father of her other son-in-law, an aged noble man of seventy-two. She was dragging herself along, rathe than walking, nearly collapsing at each step forward. Her fee seemed glued to the ground, her limbs to refuse their function her heart to beat within her breast like an animal striving t break free.

She had become quite thin and her grey hair sharply emphasis sized her sallow haggard face. She stared before her seein no one, thinking of nothing except, perhaps torturing her.

Then came Georges du Roy with an unknown old lady,

He held his head high, looking straight ahead with hard level eyes under somewhat anxious brows. Everyone voter him a fine handsome man. He had an arrogant allure, a well knit figure and a shapely limb. There was a small stain of his coat like a drop of blood. It was the crimson ribbon of the Legion of Honour.

The relations followed. Rose with Senator Rissolin. had been married six weeks. The Count de Latour-Yveli' with the Viscountess de Percemur. Finally, an odd procession of associates and friends of du Roy whom he had introduce?" into his new family, people well known in the between-worlch of Paris, the usual hangers-on of wealthy upstarts, declassed aristocrats impoverished, shady, disgraced. M de Velvigues the Marquis de Banjolin, the Count and Countess de Ravenes the duke of Ramorano, the prince of Kravalow, the cheval Valréali; then the guests of the Walters, the prince of Guerche the duke and duchess de Ferracine, the lovely Marquise der Some of Mme Walter's relations gave a provincial touch to this essentially metropolitan parade,

And all the time the mighty organ rolled, pouring those majestic notes which ery to heaven the joy or sorre mankind. Suddenly the chords trembled away into sile. orges was kneeling by Suzanne's side in the choir, lighted altar. The new bishop of Tangier, mitred, ff in hand, emerged from the sacristy to unite them e of the Eternal. He put to them the customary schanged rings, pronounced the words which tied her as in chains and then delivered to the wedded hristian homily. His lordship spoke of fidelity at in pompous terms. He was a big man with a fine of those prelates whose stomach is a thing of d of sobbing caused a few heads to turn. Iter, her face in her hands, was weeping.

had to give in! What other alternative had she? he day when she had driven her daughter from her ing her embrace, since the day when she had said emphasis to du Roy, greeting her with ceremonial ness when he presented himself to her again: "You st creature existing. Never speak to me again for reply," she had suffered unbearable, unappeasable he detested Suzanne with piercing hatred made up I passion and devouring jealousy, a strange wild mother and mistress, unavowable, ferocious, burning n wound.

before her eyes a bishop was marrying these two, ighter and her lover in the presence of two thousand And she could not say a word or do a thing to She could not cry out: "But this man is mine, he This union that you are blessing is unnatural and the women noticed her and were touched: "How poor mother is to lose her!"

p proclaimed sonorously: "You are of the happy s earth, the wealthiest, the most respected. You, whom your talent has raised above the majority, who instructs, counsels, warns and directs till ople, you have before you an honourable mission sterling example to set to others."

istened to it all eagerly. A prelate of the Roman speaking thus to him. Behind his, Church was sensed a vast congregation, an illustrious assembly gathered honour. It seemed to him as if a him there to do mighty force was pushing him forward and sustaining He had become one of the masters of the earth. he, he, the son of two poor peasants of Canteleu. see them now in their humble inn on the crest of the hill overlooking the broad valley of Rouen, entertaining their rustic friends. He had sent them five thousand francs from the Count de Vaudrec's money; and now he was going to send them another fifty thousand. They would buy a little home stead and would live in quiet contentment and happiness.

The bishop had concluded his homily. A priest, resplendent in vestments and coloured stole, ascended to the altar; and the organ pealed again, in joyous greeting to bride and bride groom.

The clamorous triumphant chords died down with startling suddenness and in their stead, a wistful plaintive melody stole through the air, gently touching the ear, like the caress of the faintest breeze, tiny quivering tender notes akin to the fluttering of birds; then crashing out again, majestic, almost terrifying in volume and strength, shaking the whole edifice, sending an involuntary shudder through body and mind. Human voices took up the refrain, over the bowed heads of the congregation, those of Vauri and Landeck of the Opera. The smell of incense spread through the church, as upon the altar the Divine sacrifice was being accomplished. God, at the call of this priest, descended to earth to sanctify the triumph of Barot Georges du Roy.

Bel-Ami was on his knees by Suzanne's side, with bowy head. At that moment, he felt himself almost believing, almoreligious, full of gratitude to that divinity whose especial favourite he was and who looked after his welfare; and without having any definite idea whom he was addressing, he see forth thanks for his success.

The service over, he rose and, giving his wife his arm, we into the vestry. Then began the interminable procession guests.

deorges, quite carried away with pride and happiness, eied himself a king responding to the acclamation of his ojects. He shook hands with everyone, murmuring meaning; words, replying to compliments and good wishes: "It is y kind of you."

Suddenly he noticed Mme de Marelle; and the remembrance all the kisses he had given her, of her reciprocation of them, all their caresses, of her fascination, the sound of her voice, taste of her lips, filled him with violent desire to take her tin.

She was so pretty and graceful with her tomboy air and rry eyes. He thought: "What a charming mistress she s."

She approached a little shy and uneasy, and held out her id. He took it in his own and retained it.

He felt the discreet appeal of feminine fingers, the gentle essure which forgave and understood. And he too, pressed a little hand as if saying, "I love you always. I belong to a!"

Their eyes met, smiling, shining, full of love. She murmured her soft gracious voice: "An revoir, Monsieur;" and he swered happily:

'Au revoir, Madame."

Others gathered round. The crowd flowed about him like river. At last it broke up. Georges took Suzanne's arm in to pass through the church. It was quite full, the guests ving resumed their seats to see the bride and bridegroom ve together. Du Roy walked slowly, calmly, head erect. eyes fixed on the sunlit street outside. Triumph surged rough him, the triumph of overwhelming good fortune. He vino one. He thought only of himself.

Dutside the main door, his eyes fell on the massed noisy owd assembled there for him, for him Georges du Roy. The ople of Paris looked on him and envied him.

Raising his eyes he saw, facing him, behind the Place de la ncorde, the Chamber of Deputies. And it seemed to him that one bound he was going to leap from the portico of la Madene to that of the Bourbon Palace. He walked slowly down the stone-steps, between two rows of spectators. But he did not see them; his thoughts were in the past and before his eyes, dazzled by the radiant sun, danced the image of Mme de Marelle, smoothing before the mirror the short crisp hair at his temples, always so untidy when rising from bed.

2064

THE EXD